Personally, I trust we can take still further steps in this regard, in order that each committee that has important legislation to follow up to see how the expenditures are made, will have access to such experts and agents entirely of our own and not in any other way connected with any other department of the Government. They would have very definite tasks and purposes as servants of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Of course, under the latitude given the committee under this resolution we are authorized to select and employ operatives anywhere. We can call into service men both inside the Government and outside the Government, but under the plan agreed upon by the committee, we expect to call only individuals already employed by the Government and under the civil service. It will be recalled that our investigations are entirely preappropriation, and we expect to get auditors, inspectors and examiners from departments other than those being examined and in that way will be in a position to secure the most expert and best trained operatives at the least cost.

Mr. PATTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SELECT COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES

Mr. PATTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 124 (Rept. No. 140), and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That effective January 3, 1943, the expenses of conducting the investigation authorized by House Resolution 282 of the Seventy-fifth Congress, and continued under House Resolution 26 of the Seventy-sixth Congress, House Resolution 321 of the Seventy-sixth Congress, House Resolution 90 of the Seventy-seventh Congress, House Resolution 420 of the Seventy-seventh Congress, and House Resolution 65 of the Seventy-eighth Congress, incurred by the special committee appointed to investigate un-American activities in the United States and related questions, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, not to exceed $75,000 in addition to the unexpended balance heretofore appropriated for this purpose during the Seventy-seventh Congress, including expenditures for the employment of experts, and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by such committee, signed by the chairman thereof and approved by the Committee on Accounts.

SEC. 2. That the official committee reporters may be used at all hearings held in the District of Columbia, if not otherwise officially engaged.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATTON. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Of course, Mr. Speaker, this is the appropriation for the Dies committee which passed this House by a vote of 3 to 1. This resolution passed the Accounts Committee unanimously. As a matter of fact, the chairman of that committee [Mr. DIES] and other members of the committee wanted the amount reduced, but the committee would have given him twice or three times the amount he has asked for. I hope the resolution is agreed to unanimously.

Mr. PATTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, a few months ago I wrote to the Committee on Accounts, and I wrote that letter because I felt the Accounts Committee is the business committee of the House. It is a sort of watchdog of our Treasury as to the appropriation of funds for the various committees. The letter I wrote is, among other things, as follows:

You have before your committee a request of Chairman DIES of the House Committee on Un-American Activities that Congress pay $611 as an "expense" incurred in connection with two libel suits brought against him in his personal capacity.

The gentleman from Texas was accused of libeling one David Vaughan of the Board of Economic Warfare by demanding his resignation because Mr. DIES alleged Mr. Vaughan was the founder of the League for Peace and Democracy.

I am informed Mr. Vaughan sued Mr. DIES personally for $75,000. Mr. Vaughan withdrew his action after Mr. DIES apologized and said it was a case of mistaken identity. The discontinuance was apparently upon the condition that the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] pay the counsel of Mr. Vaughan $611.

Now our colleague wants this $611 paid by the House, presumably either out of the contingent funds of the House or out of the appropriation for the Dies committee.

I, for one, do not feel that the House can pay out this money. It is a personal expense incurred by a Member's error. A Member cannot ask the House to pay for his own improvidence. It is not an expense of Mr. DIES' own committee. In libeling a citizen he was acting beyond the scope of his authority as chairman and member of the Committee on Un-American Activities and beyond the scope of his authority as a Member of the House. His remarks could not have been privileged, otherwise Mr. DIES would have had a complete defense. He admitted the libel.

Suppose the expense would have covered a long and protracted trial and had been $60,000. Could Mr. DIES determine the size of the expense to be saddled upon the House? Could he make it as small or as large as he wished? There is involved a dangerous precedent. The House has never gone to such extremes.

If we were to defray legal expenses of suits against a Member, why not the expense of suits brought by a Member? Then a distinguished Member of our body who has actually instituted a series of libel suits might well ask the House to finance his litigations.

Mr. DIES seeks to justify his claim by saying that the libel was a result of his official actions. I deny this. The libel was the result of his own deliberate, personal mistake.

If Mr. DIES would prevail in his contention, then any Member would be privileged to libel and slander at will anyone he chose, claiming official license and resting secure in the thought that the House would pay all punitive damages and expenses.

The only case I know of where the expense of a Member's litigation is paid by the House is in an election contest.

Mr ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I may say that the members of the Accounts Committee went into that one whole morning. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] appeared before the committee, and we unanimously, every one of us, thought he did a swell job in what he had done. I believe the gentleman from New York is probably the only Member of the House who feels the way he does.

Mr. CELLER. That may be so, but I am duty bound to express my opinion. I feel emphatically that the House should not be saddled with this bill. A highly dangerous precedent is established. At least from henceforth onward let the gentleman from Texas never repeat the mistake and let us never again pay or approve payment of such a bill, such an expense.

What I have said involves nothing personal. I have an affectionate regard, personally, for the gentleman from Texas, although I must vigorously, whenever possible, express my opposition to his political and economic ideology and also to some of his methods. I believe he is sincere and is an avid champion of his cause. His sincerity and forcefulness, to my mind, makes his activities all the more dangerous.

Mr. PATTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, it is certainly amazing to hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], after all his abuse and criticism of the Dies committee and all his defense of the members of the League for Peace and Democracy, get up here and criticize the Dies committee and accuse the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] of willful libel for saying a man belonged to that iniquitous organization.

I do not know anything about the small amount of expense, but he had the unmitigated temerity—I will not say "gall"—I ought to say "gall" but I will say "temerity"—to get up here and say that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] deliberately libeled a man by calling him a member of an organization that the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] has been defending for the last few months.

This is just another method of attacking the Dies committee—a committee that is doing a wonderful job in exposing those un-American activities, those dangerous activities, that threaten the very existence of this Republic at a time when our boys are fighting and dying to preserve it. I say "our boys," for practically every Member of the House today has some relative in the battle of north Africa; every Member of the House has a relative in Guadalcanal or in the southwest Pacific. While our boys are fighting and dying to preserve this Republic, I say it comes with poor grace for a Member of Congress to get up here and abuse the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] who without any hope of compensation has led this fight to protect America from those dangerous un-American influences that threaten the very life of this Republic.

Mr. PATTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COOPER). The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, this is a typical illustration of the many misstatements that are made constantly about this committee. I wish some of these gentlemen who are repeating gossip and rumors would have the courtesy to come to the committee offices, take our hearings, our files, and go through them for themselves before they repeat something without knowing the facts.

What are the facts? The facts are these: The Attorney General and the Interdepartmental Committee established by him found that 12 organizations were subversive, including the American League for Peace and Democracy, and further the Attorney General's memorandum stated that it was so subversive that one could not be affiliated with it and not be aware of its subversive nature.

I wrote a letter to the Vice President, as the head of the Board of Economic Warfare, calling his attention to certain employees of the Board who were affiliated with organizations that the Attorney General had found to be subversive. Before I wrote that letter the investigators were instructed to check these Government employees and to make certain of the identities of them. The investigators reported to me that in their attempt to do so they were met with contempt. In fact, some of the departments refused to give us access to the personnel records. I impressed upon them the necessity of being very, very accurate, and they were accurate in every case except one. I do not know how many names we had. There were a number of names called to the attention of the Vice President, and he was by public opinion compelled to discharge Parmalee and Gratton, who had written the introduction to the German White Paper. Parmalee was the author of books on nudism. The Vice President was compelled to discharge those two, and Parmalee was later employed in another department. It is true that David Vaughn was different from the David Vaughn appearing upon our list and upon the stationery of the organization. He was a different David Vaughn than the David Vaughn in the B. E. W.

When it was definitely established that this David Vaughn, having the same name and coming, as I recall, from the same section of the country, was not the same person and that the investigator had been mistaken, of course, I apologized to him. Not only did I apologize to him but may I say that we had no lawyer. The reason we did not have any lawyer was because we could not hire a lawyer under $700 or $800 a month. We had no lawyers and we were not paying out any expenses for attorney's fees.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIES. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CELLER. Could not the gentleman have raised the question of personal privilege as a Member of the House or stated that the statement was made in his official capacity as chairman of the Committee on Un-American Activities?

Mr. DIES. This was the only case out of the hundreds that had been named. Here was a man who came forth and said, "Now, you have the wrong man. Here are the facts, and I want to satisfy you to that effect." He had been hurt by this statement—that is, he thought he had—although high officials of the administration that he worked for had ridiculed us for branding the American League as a Communist-front organization. He felt so aggrieved by the statement of his alleged association with that organization that he was hurt.

Mr. CELLER. Why did the gentleman not go on with the trial if he had an adequate defense?

Mr. DIES. It was not a question of going on with the trial. Here was a man who had incurred legal expenses for $500, not $611. He had incurred a legal expense for $500. We had no attorney. I submitted the facts to the Committee on Accounts and that committee felt in view of those facts that it would be justified in paying an attorney fee of $500.

Mr. CELLER. Does not the gentleman think that is a very dangerous precedent to establish?

Mr. DIES. Well, as all gentlemen who are chairmen of committees know, we must rely upon our investigators to a large extent. I suppose that the gentleman from Georgia, who is doing a thankless job, appreciates that.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I am in almost the same fix that the gentleman is in now, and I hope the Congress will establish a precedent that where a committee acting as the agent of the House is involved in litigation the House will take care of the litigation.

Mr. CELLER. Why did the gentleman not avail himself of the Judiciary Committee's functions? We would be very happy to aid the gentleman on questions of law and that sort of thing.

Mr. DIES. I did not know that. I did not know that your committee tendered such services. We will be glad to avail ourselves of it in the future.

Mr. PATTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COOPER). The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demand by Mr. DICKSTEIN and Mr. KENNEDY) there were—ayes 133, noes 29.

Mr. DICKSTEIN rose.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted.

Evidently a sufficient number.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I was on my feet making a point of order that a quorum is not present, and I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present. The call is automatic.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 278, nays 66, not voting 90, as follows:

AMENDMENT OF AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT OF 1938

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 107.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1605) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, with respect to farm-acreage allotments, the farm marketing excess of wheat, the use of excess corn as silage for feed to livestock on the farm, to provide for the adequate supply of peanuts for oil and other uses, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on Agriculture, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

AMENDMENT OF AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT OF 1938

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] and now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, and insert certain excerpts, and then within the 10 minutes to speak out of order on a matter of considerable interest to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, this rule makes in order H. R. 1605, reported by the Committee on Agriculture, which proposes aid to the peanut growers of the country. I do not recall whether or not there was any opposition in the Committee on Rules to the granting of the rule. However, in view of the fact that the farmers of the country are interested, I presume there will not be much opposition to the rule or to the bill, and therefore I can leave it to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture to further explain the bill and what it undertakes to do for the peanut growers of the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], who is extremely well posted on all matters, somehow or other does not seem to realize that we are not at war with Russia, and that we are actually at war with Japan and Germany. I was under the impression that after that strong, impressive speech, made by the great lady, Madam Chiang Kai-shek, representing the great Chinese Government and its people, nothing would be said on the floor that would in any way detract from her plea to aid in every conceivable way the winning of the war.

With regret I noticed in the newspapers today a headline to the effect that our Army in Tunisia is almost cut in half by the Yanks' retreat. Surely that is not encouraging news.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I take the privilege of referring to a speech which I delivered nearly 5 years ago, in which I called attention to the danger that confronted America and the world. I said then that our country was facing a situation whereby it became absolutely necessary that we should do all in our power to prepare to safeguard our interests.

I pointed out that Hitler was ready to take Czechoslovakia; that he would take it; that he would take the Polish Corridor and that he would take Poland; that he would take the city of Danzig; that he would take Rumania; and that he would take the smaller countries; and also, due to the discord and disunity in France, that he would probably bring about the defeat of France, and after that would hope or try to bring about the defeat of Britain. I then asked the question how far Hitler would be if he should succeed in defeating Great Britain. I pointed out all of these dangers that confronted our country, but, unfortunately, many people at that time refused to believe that it would be possible for Hitler to attack us. They refused to believe that he could cross the ocean or in any way bring about a situation that would require us to prepare against such danger.

My predictions on the floor 5 years ago have come true. Many people during those 5 years did not believe, and there are still some people who refuse to realize, that we are in danger, and that it is necessary to have complete unity, coordination, and cooperation. The reason I am taking the floor is to urge that we should eliminate any and all differences that we might have and realize our duty to our country, to our form of government, to the future of humanity. That was my purpose in asking that I might revise and extend my remarks and include today extracts from the speech I made 5 years ago. I wish time would permit me to read the speech. I know that the gentlemen who heard me then would now agree that I knew what I was talking about at that time, when I said that there was a tacit agreement between Hitler, Mussolini, and the Japanese war lords, when I called attention to that in 1935, 3 years before.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. BENDER. I congratulate the gentleman for having such foresight, but did the gentleman at the same time call attention to the fact when he made that speech, that we were supplying Japan with 54 percent of the war materials she was using against China?

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman again is attempting to inject a little politics by his statement. Personally, I wish to assure the gentleman that I did call the situation to the attention of the administration, but the administration, fearful of being drawn into war with Japan at that time, endeavored to appease them. We knew that they had been preparing for years and would obtain these war materials by force from adjoining countries had we refused to comply with the continuous demands of American manufacturers to supply them. Our own unpreparedness was such at that time that we were hopeful that our action would appease them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Mississippi yield me 5 minutes more?

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BULWINKLE. I wish the gentleman from Illinois would answer the gentleman by reminding him that in the month of September before Pearl Harbor, we passed the extension of the draft bill by only 1 vote, and there were only 12 votes on that side of the Chamber.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I am sorry I cannot yield at this time.

Mr. Speaker, when I asked for this time I was hopeful that what I might say would help bring about unity and a better understanding and feeling among all of us so that we would have that harmonious cooperation which is so sadly needed. I did not wish to hurt the feelings of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], and had I thought he would be hurt or that any gentleman would be hurt by anything I said, I would not have alluded to him or to anything that might create any discussion. I want you to know that I am extremely desirous of being of service to my country. I was here during the first war. I have been more or less familiar with our situation. I have studied the foreign situation. I know something about it, but I do not claim to be an expert in international affairs and familiar with all foreign intrigues, but I fully realize the situation that confronts our country. What I want is harmony, unity, cooperation, so that we may, in the shortest possible time, help to bring about a victory, and then an everlasting peace for humanity and the preservation of our democratic form of government.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Regardless of the content of the address 5 years ago by the gentleman from Illinois or his remarks today, I should like to say there are those of us who are younger in years and point of service in this House who appreciate the gentleman's character, and the vigor for the time of service that the gentleman from Illinois still brings to this Chamber.

Mr. SABATH. I thank the gentleman. I assure you I am not seeking any glory, because within a few days I will be 77. I do not know how many more years I have, but those days and years that God will grant me I want to devote to a country that has been extremely kind to me, and which has done so much for me. I look upon America as the greatest country in the world, where justice, humanity and fairness prevail, and I hope to God liberty and freedom will forever be ours.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LANHAM). The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] has again expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, under the leave given me, I insert extracts from the speech which I made on this floor March 18, 1938, nearly 5 years ago, as follows:

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that if an archangel were to come down from heaven and make an observation in the interest of peace, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] would criticize it.

EXPRESSED BELIEF IN SECRET CONSPIRACY 3 YEARS AGO

Three years ago I voiced belief that a secret or tacit agreement existed between Hitler, Mussolini, and Japan, but my warning went unheeded. The strategy practiced by those countries conformed exactly to that predicted by Professor Masaryk, who was intimately aware of Germany's ambitions.

In the Orient Japan pursued a course toward domination of the yellow races, apparently with preassurance that Italy and Germany would so engage the attention of the European democracies that interference in China would be impossible.

In Ethiopia Mussolini's war machine grinded to its conquest while Hitler's silence gave approval.

Internal dissent in Spain, nourished by the dictator countries, finally flamed into civil war, and the legions of Italian and German soldiers took stand in battle against the established government.

Hitler, demanding the return of Germany's lost colonies, only cloaked his purpose of European aggression, and it was long ago clear that he would one day climax the years of planned propaganda in Austria by an invasion of that country. His seizure of Austria is but a prelude of more ambitious plans. Peace- and liberty-loving Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Hungary, and the other small independent nations now see his shadow across their lands—Memel, Danzig, and the Polish Corridor, Alsace-Lorraine, and the much-desired Ukraine.

For the time being, engaged in consolidating his gains, he may utter reassuring words to Poland and Yugoslavia. But they have only to recall his utter disregard of treaties, and his oft-repeated statements as to his ultimate aims, to realize how necessary it is that they prepare to resist invasion, for invasion is bound to come.

IL DUCE MAY BE MAKING SAD MISTAKE IN TRUSTING HITLER

Whether Il Duce is as smart as he thinks he is in cooperating with the imperialistic-minded Hitler only the future will tell. But there are many sapient observers who have their doubts. They believe that Hitler will not hesitate to throw his now comrade, Il Duce, overboard when and if he becomes strong enough to be able to get along without him.

AMERICA MUST TAKE NOTE OF WHAT IS GOING ON IN THE WORLD

One may properly ask, How does all this affect America? Who knows? In this fateful hour, with all the civilized world well nigh breathless, I do not feel that we should follow the vacillating policy of Great Britain, who, in the opinion of many well-qualified students of international affairs, may be the next prey of the remorseless triumvirate. Many ripe scholars feel that the suppression of Great Britain will mean the consummation of a plan to form three great powers outside of North and South America. I doubt very much that France, which is fighting domestic problems with her back to the wall, and Russia, despised by the capitalistic groups of the world, could, after the disappearance of the other countries I have named, long withstand being dismembered also. There is not the slightest doubt in my mind but that Hitler, Mussolini, and the raving-mad Japanese war lords are in a conspiracy to divide the entire world among themselves, or at least as much of it as they can manage to grab.

POLISH LEADERS SHOULD NOT FORGET TREATMENT ACCORDED POLES IN PRUSSIA

Great Britain, rather late, is commencing to realize its danger. Does Poland realize her danger?

The leaders in Poland might well hearken back to other days, and consider the former treatment of Poles in Prussia. I remember in 1908 how Prussia prohibited, by edict, the teaching of the Polish language in their own schools, and how they proposed in their Parliament a compulsory dispossession of the homes of Polanders. For 2,000 years the Poles and their fathers before them had occupied this land, but notwithstanding and in contravention of the Congress of Vienna of 1815, and in violation of Prussia's organic laws prohibiting distinctions between citizens of the Kingdom, that Kingdom's Parliament even then showed its prejudice and discrimination against the Polish.

At the time I speak of, Congressman Arthur L. Bates, of Pennsylvania, was impelled to introduce into this House a resolution extending good wishes and sympathy to the Poles in Prussia in their efforts to maintain their property rights.

Recalling this, and viewing the present prejudice which governs in Germany, Poland should properly estimate the future insofar as her relations with that country are concerned.

AMERICA MAY NOT BE AS SAFE AS SHE FEELS

Up to about 12 years ago we confidently believed ourselves properly protected against possible attack from any and all quarters; but in view of the increased and ever-increasing knowledge of aviation and mammoth airplane carriers, are we really free from military danger?

If this nefarious triumvirate should effect the dismemberment of the great British Empire, what would become of Canada? Could we still feel free and at ease without present-day Canada?

* * * * *

In view of all this and our enemies within, I feel that it behooves us adequately to protect ourselves against even the remotest eventuality. I have heard it said with plausibility that if England had stated her position unequivocally in the early days of 1914, and if America had been prepared in 1916, these acts would have had a most salutary effect, and it would not have been necessary to send millions of our young men across the sea and expend billions of dollars. Consequently, and repeating, I feel that we owe it to ourselves to prepare for any, even the most imaginable possibility. Therefore, I am ready to vote for the construction of a navy and an air force that will be unmistakably adequate for our proper defense.

DO NOT CLAIM TO BE MORE PATRIOTIC THAN THOSE WHO DISAGREE

It is not my aim to try to make anybody believe I am more patriotic than those who do not favor this increased naval plan. We all recognize among that group a highly patriotic impulse. They, too, think their judgment would be better for the country. The only interest I have in the problem of national defense is the welfare of our whole country, to which I owe much and for which I am ready to give everything I possess. This great country of my adoption has been kind to me, and if I leave behind only one legacy, I want it to be a contribution, weak though it be, to the defense, not offense, and the promotion of the welfare of the land that made me whatever I am and gave me whatever I have.

Let me say that I feel a grave mistake was made by some of the political leaders of 20 years ago, who, for purely political purposes, prevented the United States from joining other peace-loving nations in a hopeful effort to outlaw war and all its frightful consequences by the League of Nations. That failure unquestionably weakened the League at the outset, and it has in no small measure destroyed its usefulness.

I well remember when President Wilson returned from his first trip to Paris and invited the members of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations and the members of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs to the White House to hear his explanation of the League plan, because I was at the time a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The only sitting members of the Committee on Foreign Relations are Senators Pittman and Borah. I am the only sitting Member of the House who participated in that historic meeting.

Mr. Wilson made a confidential report to the members of these two committees, and in a 3-hour session he endeavored to obtain the advice and consent of those present. All present were asked to question the President on each and every provision, which many, as I recall, did, and all were apparently satisfied by the President's lucid and masterly exposition of the infinite possibilities of that great humanitarian plan. In addition to securing the advice and consent of the members of those two committees, Mr. Wilson consulted such eminent Americans and Republicans as former President Taft, former Secretary of State Elihu Root, and others, all of whom acquiesced in the President's conclusions. I especially remember that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of that time, Mr. Lodge, of Massachusetts, propounded to President Wilson many questions and appeared satisfied, yet a few months later, unfortunately, the same Senator Lodge who had given unmistakable assurance of accord with the plan, became, in his important official position, the spearhead, largely for political purposes, of the opposition to the League plan. It is a fact that there was opposition to the League of Nations, simply because it was the only issue Republican leaders of that day could evolve in opposing the Democratic Party. In this opposition they were aided by the disgruntled, vitriolic Jim Reed, then a Senator from Missouri.

It was alleged that the League Covenant provided for sending our boys across the sea; while in fact there was nothing in the League Covenant that justified such a conclusion. I maintained then, and I repeat, that the underlying opposition to the League, aside from the political consideration, was the objection of industrial leaders of the Nation to the international labor provisions, which provided, in article 20 of the covenant of the League, that—

"The high-contracting parties will endeavor to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labor for men, women, and children, both in their own countries and in all countries to which their commercial and industrial relations extended, and to that end will agree to establish as part of the organization of the League a permanent bureau of labor."

BELIEVE AMERICA'S MEMBERSHIP OF THE LEAGUE WOULD HAVE BEEN BENEFICIAL

I am confident today, beyond all doubt, that had the United States joined the League of Nations it would have strengthened and preserved the League in full vigor and effectiveness and we would not have present-day conditions, with all democracies of Europe either destroyed or on the verge of destruction. I still believe that under the terms of the League Covenant we could have precluded the mad rearmament race by close adhesion to and renewal of the provisions of the Washington Arms Conference after the 10-year limit, to the lasting benefit of all civilization. At the conclusion of the Washington Arms Conference the United States felt fairly easy; and it was only our absence from membership in the League that led first Germany, then Italy, and, shortly thereafter, Japan to withdraw from membership in the League. Then trouble began. The plot thickened. Now we have the fruit.

Moreover, I feel that if Great Britain and France had taken a firm stand against the initial rearmament of Hitler, Mussolini, and Japan, and had not been lulled to sleep by undependable peace assurances, they would have been in position 2 years ago to stop Mussolini and Hitler in their mad rush toward a menacing world conquest. Should we, then, follow the vacillating and always unloading policy of Great Britain or should we be ready to properly defend ourselves and our possessions against any and all?

I LIKE TO FEEL THAT I CAN CHANGE MY VIEWPOINTS IN ACCORDANCE WITH CHANGED CONDITIONS

And so, in conclusion, let me say that in view of the alarming world conditions to which I have alluded, I shall vote and work for the passage of the pending bill. This may be surprising to some of the critics who have accused me of being a pacifist, charging that I was against adequate national defense; but let me say to them it is not they who have changed my view. I was just as conscientious when I opposed large Army and Navy appropriations in past years as I am conscientious today in supporting this bill. I have changed my views because and only because world conditions have changed. When I get so old or so benumbed of brain and character that I cannot change my view in accordance with changing conditions and a changing world, it is time for me to be carried out feet first, and I want to be.

I have criticized conditions and things at times, and I shall do so again whenever I see anything that I think merits criticism. But I love this country. I will vote any amount of money necessary to protect it from enemies either within or without. Today, perhaps more than at any other time in its history, the United States of America stands out against the dark and stormy seas of racial persecution, intrigue, conspiracy, and jealousy as the one and only enduring beacon light of hope.

I am grateful to the people of my district for having permitted me for so many years to be a Member of this great American Congress, the greatest democratic legislative body on earth, wherein every man is accorded the unfettered right to say what he pleases. Let us strive to preserve and promote this priceless heritage for ourselves and posterity. I do not expect to be here forever, but I do want the Stars and Stripes and a democratic form of government to endure here forever.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that a reading of these extracts from my 5-year-old speech should satisfy the membership that I then possessed information to some degree of the Hitler-Mussolini-Jap aims. With the partial fulfillment of those aims we, today, should recognize that in order to combat the viper propaganda of these insidious and treacherous forces and to win this war we should join hands and forget our personal views and differences. Our every effort, thought, and action henceforth should be guided to that one goal of bringing defeat to the ruthless Axis combination that, contrary to treaties and agreements, has devoted many years in preparation for the building of war machines with the avowed purposes of destroying our form of government and the democracies of the world. And, Mr. Speaker, who will deny that we should, in all fairness, recognize and appreciate that Russia, under the leadership of Josef Stalin, is contributing more than any other nation in bringing about the defeat of our enemies?

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, the Member from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] went into a frantic diatribe about my statement a few moments ago and seemed attempting to leave the impression on the House that I was not in line with the policy announced by the speaker who appeared here representing China today. That is absolutely without foundation. There is my speech. What he is ranting about is that we passed the resolution continuing the Dies committee to investigate un-American activities. I am happy to do that.

Mr. SABATH. I did not speak on the Dies resolution.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman tried to get time to say something against the Dies committee and could not get it. He would destroy the Dies committee if he could. He does not seem to be interested in the things the Dies committee is bringing out, but we are.

Mr. SABATH. Oh, I created the Dies committee.

Mr. RANKIN. And now when it is doing its duty you want to destroy it.

Mr. SABATH. No, no; not at all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 10 minutes, and I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, certainly I do not intend to intrude on the quarrels on the Democratic side of the House, but I must say that I think that Members of the House on both sides, who insist on resurrecting pre-war controversial issues, which divide this House and the country, are doing a disservice to national unity and to our all-out war efforts to be continually dragging in such issues.

I know the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] is a sincere, honorable, and distinguished Member of this House, but I wish he would not raise these ghosts and bring them back for discussion in the House, because every time he does he starts bitter discussions which open up other controversial issues such as the draft or the extension of the draft, and so forth. Every Member of the House today was united in welcoming the First Lady of China, Mme. Chiang Kai-shek, who gave us a soul-inspiring address, which all of us, on both sides of the House, applauded. I interpret that wonderful applause to mean that both sides of the House were in entire sympathy with that part of her address where she called for more aid to China and greater military efforts in the far Pacific; that a Japanese sword of Damocles was hanging over the heads of the world, and unless we did more to meet that threat by sending more powerful forces over to the far Pacific to fight the Japanese, they would benefit by the natural resources from their conquered territories and be much stronger and consequently more difficult to defeat.

I think we are all agreed that Japan attacked us 14 months ago but that we are still fighting around the fringes of the Japanese Empire, amongst its fingers and the toes 3,000 miles away from Tokyo, that all of us want to carry this war to final conclusion by attacking the heart and the head of Japan.

The gentleman talks about what he said 5 years ago. Only a few weeks ago in this House I took the floor and pleaded that General MacArthur be placed in supreme command of all our armed forces in the far Pacific, that more aid be given to China, that 500 fighting airplanes, and 500 bombers be given to her so she could turn from the defensive to the offensive.

Mrs. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mrs. LUCE. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the Chinese have no airplanes of their own at the moment, or at least no quantity of planes anywhere near commensurate with her great position as one of our equal partners in this war?

Mr. FISH. I am making a plea, and have been pleading, that we do everything in our power to send immediately 500 fighting airplanes and 500 bombers to China, and more if possible.

I ask the gentlewoman from Connecticut: If the Chinese had a thousand fighting airplanes and a thousand bombers could she not then turn from the defensive to the offensive and bomb Japan?

Mrs. LUCE. So it has been often said by experts out there. I believe, however, the gentleman from New York misses my point. All the planes which are now being sent to China are being sent to the American air forces there. The point I make is that the Chinese, who are supposed to be our equal partners in this great war effort, are being sent no planes, so far as I am informed, whatsoever, for their own national use in fighting the Japanese. I wondered if the gentleman was aware of that, and if perhaps the gentleman did not feel that the Chinese people should have some air strength of their own in this war under lend-lease arrangements?

Mr. FISH. I am sure everybody in this House on both sides would agree with the statement made by the gentlewoman from Connecticut, and hopes that we can send more and more airplanes not only for our own fliers but particularly for the Chinese air pilots. The thought uppermost in the minds of most Americans is that we should concentrate our efforts to help China and attack the heart of Japan. When are we going to bomb Japan either from China or from our own air carriers? Before Pearl Harbor it was freely predicted that we could destroy the Japanese Navy in 2 weeks and Tokyo in 3.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. The gentleman knows we have been doing our utmost to aid in the training of Chinese pilots at Thunderbird Field, which I believe is in Arizona, and that we have just recently completed some training classes. The Chinese, of course, would have great difficulty in using these planes without proper training.

Mr. FISH. I want to be fair; I think everybody on both sides of the aisle wants to be fair. It is difficult to get these airplanes to China. If we could do so, we would arm five or ten million Chinese and fully equip them with weapons of war. If we do that, they could take care of themselves and drive the Japanese out of China. We certainly ought to be able to get airplanes into China. I have suggested on the floor of this House that it is not going too far to ask Soviet Russia to permit American airplanes flying from Alaska to land in Siberia, not for the purpose of bombing Japan, but to land in Siberia for the purpose of hopping on to China. We have given Soviet Russia over a billion dollars of lend-lease supplies in the last year. Certainly this is not asking too much, and it is one way of expediting getting airplanes into China for our own pilots and for the Chinese pilots.

Mr. Speaker, I have digressed considerably from the consideration of the pending legislation under the rule and I have done so largely in answer to the opening remarks of the chairman of the Rules Committee. This is called a peanut bill, but it is far from being peanut legislation, even though one called it a jumbo peanut bill; that would not describe the purposes of the bill.

This is a far-reaching, vital, and important agricultural measure. The whole question of subsidies is involved, and you Members of the House must decide whether you are in favor of continuing subsidies or not. The Appropriations Subcommittee on Agriculture after considering this question of subsidies voted, 6 to 1, against an appropriation of $100,000,000 for a subsidy program backed by the Secretary of Agriculture. I should like to be corrected if I am in error, but I have been informed by members of the Committee on Agriculture that there were no hearings on this peanut provision which may call for a sum of $50,000,000 annually.

The peanut acreage has been increased from almost 2,000,000 acres in the last few years to 4,000,000 acres; yet they come in and ask for more subsidies and more acreage. It raises a question for the House to decide whether it wants to continue this program of subsidies. We are confronted today with the greatest agricultural tragedy that has ever been witnessed in the United States of America, the shortage of food. We have never been faced with a shortage of food in the entire history of this country. We are told daily that we will have a shortage of food, that we will not be able to even feed our own people in this country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 4 additional minutes.

Mr. Speaker, we are told that we cannot even feed our own people in this country when most people are talking about feeding the whole world with American farm products. You cannot pick up a paper without reading some article about our feeding Europe, Africa, and Asia, and particularly Great Britain, Russia, our allies and our partners in the war. How are we to take care of the people in the war-devastated areas when in the very near future we may not be able to take care of 130,000,000 Americans? Something is very wrong with American agriculture.

If you go back a few years, you can see what is wrong, the program of destruction, the program of scarcity, the plowing under of crops, the killing of herds, and the birth control of pigs, which has brought America down to the very lowest depths where we are now faced with serious food shortages and striving to feed our own people for the first time in history.

This is no peanut bill; it involves the whole agricultural program and is a matter that ought to be considered in the House most carefully because it was not considered carefully in the Rules Committee or by the Committee on Agriculture. The gentleman sponsoring this bill is one of the ablest Members of this House, and I refer to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE]. There is no better Member; he is a trained legislator; but the trouble is he is too trained, he is too good, he is able to accomplish for his people, for the peanut people down in his State of Georgia and adjoining States, certain advantages which they transcend what should rightly be passed by Congress for either the peanut growers or any others engaged in agriculture. I want to congratulate him because I know he represents his people well; but what I am fearful of is that he has brought this bill in here without the usual hearings by the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. PACE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PACE. The gentleman has been misinformed. I am sure every member of the Committee on Agriculture present will tell the gentleman that the bill was not only considered by the committee but was considered for days and we appeared for 2 separate days before the Rules Committee. The gentleman was detained elsewhere 1 day. But we went into the matter as exhaustively as we were permitted to and the gentleman should not charge against us because we did not have perhaps a week before the Rules Committee.

Mr. FISH. As I understand it, no hearings at all were held by the Committee on Agriculture on the peanut schedule.

Mr. PACE. This also involves merchantable wheat and corn.

Mr. FISH. But the major one, and the one I am discussing now, is the peanut section which may call for an appropriation of $40,000,000.

Mr. PACE. The gentleman has been misinformed.

Mr. FISH. I understand there were no hearings by the Committee on Agriculture on the peanut schedule and have been so informed by members of that committee. Does the gentleman deny that?

Furthermore, as far as the Rules Committee is concerned, may I say to the gentleman that I voted to report this bill out. I just took it for granted the Committee on Agriculture had held hearings, that they knew what it was all about, and when the gentleman came there with his very persuasive arguments I naturally followed him as I always like to do. Since then I have been given other information and have had an opportunity to study the bill.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I would like to say on behalf of the gentleman from Georgia that there were plenty of hearings in our Agricultural Committee. I am a member of that committee and I will say there were plenty of hearings.

Mr. FISH. Plenty of hearings, but not on the peanut schedule.

I am reliably informed that no outside witnesses were heard.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Oh, yes; there were.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, my concept of this bill is to the effect that section 4 is really the meat of the bill and that the purpose of section 4 primarily is to increase the production of vegetable oil for the use of our people and those with whom we are now associated. In looking over the record I find that our domestic vegetable oil supply comes primarily from corn, cottonseed, peanuts, soybeans, and flaxseed.

I think at the very beginning of this debate we should get fixed in our minds somewhat of a concept of where our vegetable oils come from; therefore I am going to use just a moment or two to give a few basic figures. As probably most all of us know, corn oil is a byproduct of the grinding of corn, with about 1 to 1½ pounds of oil per bushel of corn ground.

With reference to cottonseed, about 80 percent of the cottonseed of the country is crushed. Cottonseed has about a 15½-percent crude-oil content with about 440 pounds of cottonseed per acre as against 450 cotton linters per acre and about 69 pounds of crude cottonseed oil per acre of seed, or 442 pounds of seed.

On soybeans we have a yield of about 18.9 bushels of beans per acre, with about 9 pounds of oil per bushel of beans, or, say, 170 pounds of oil per acre from the soybeans.

In connection with linseed oil from flaxseed, we get about 8.8 bushels of flaxseed per acre, with an oil yield of about 19.4 pounds per bushel, or, say, 171 pounds of linseed oil per acre, and that would be raw linseed oil.

With reference to peanuts, that crop being perhaps one of the greatest foods we can possibly produce in this country, we have about 741 pounds of peanuts average production per acre, with an oil content of roughly 29 percent or approximately 215 pounds of oil per acre of peanuts produced.

Then in connection with peanuts we have those that are grown for the confectioner or table trade, for edible purposes. We also have the peanuts grown for the purpose of crushing and converting into peanut oil and peanut meal in the way of highly concentrated protein feed that we can use for poultry, livestock, and other purposes.

For some years we have had more or less of a peanut program here, which will undoubtedly be explained by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr.

PACE], as the debate goes on, so I shall not go too much into that subject.

We have at the present time, as I understand the Department of Agriculture, a top price of 13 cents per pound for peanut oil in the refined form. I believe that is the price which has been set, the ceiling price. That is for oil, $27.95 per acre; and per ton of peanuts for oil use say about $75 to $85 per ton. Peanuts for edible purposes have recently sold for as high as $175 per ton, so there you get an illustration of the value of peanuts going into oil as against the value of peanuts going to the table in the form of butter or, if they go to the confectioners, in the form of peanut candy and other items along that line.

Virginia grows what may be termed "the jumbo peanut," and that product has recently sold as high as $325 to $350 per ton as against the Southwestern-grown peanuts, grown down in the great State of Texas, which have sold for oil as low as about $84 per ton within the last 60 to 90 days.

Now we have in section 4 a proposal that for any peanuts produced in the years 1943 and 1944, delivered to such agencies as the Secretary of Agriculture may designate, regardless of their utilization, that is, regardless of whether they go into oil or whether they are used for edible purposes, the producer shall be paid prices determined by the Secretary at not less than 85 percent of the parity price for peanuts as of July 15 of the year in which such peanuts were produced. But I direct your attention to the proviso at the close of section 4.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. In the bill as it was originally introduced there was a proviso which penalized any peanut farmer for selling his peanuts to anybody but the Government. The penalty was 3 cents a pound. That section of the bill was stricken in the committee. I am bringing that out because the gentleman is talking on that subject.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes. I thank the gentleman for that contribution. I think it is very important for us to discover first that people have beer penalized for growing peanuts at the rate of 3 cents, just referred to. It is also important to find that the committee is striking out that penalty in connection with the language I just read. However, the whole crop for oil purposes and edible purposes is now brought into what we will term the "purchase program." If you will refer to page 1036 of the RECORD of February 16, 1943, which is at your seat, you will find that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURRAY] has inserted a table showing production goals for 1943, with comparisons.

Roughly, you will find there that the production goal on peanuts is around 5,500,000 acres for the coming year. My rough figures indicate that with 5,000,000 acres of peanuts grown for the current year, with roughly 750 pounds of peanuts per acre, there will be a total of 1,875,000 tons. With, roughly, 200,000 tons of that going back to the farmers for seed and general farm use, leaving available for commercial use 1,675,000 tons, and with 500,000 tons of the last figures being used for edible purposes, there would be about 1,175,000 tons to be devoted to the production of vegetable oil or, we will say, for oil use.

In connection with the revamping of the parity formula, to include the cost of farm labor and which, I understand, we shall probably consider here within a few days, I would say that, roughly, 85 percent of parity, as stated on page 5 of the bill now under consideration, would call for a price of around $139 per ton. With an oil value of, let us say, $85 per ton, or a loss on peanuts devoted to oil use of about $54 per ton. Then, calculating the 1,175,000 tons for oil use at $54 per ton would give you a rough figure covering the subsidy of, say, $63,450,000 involved in this bill.

If, on the other hand, you take the 500,000 tons which are used for edible purposes and calculate that at a parity of about $163, with 85 percent of that being $139, you have a difference there of, roughly, $24 as between the full parity and 85 percent of parity.

If you imposed upon the consuming trade, and I understand this matter has been discussed more or less, a $24 tax, we will call it, that being the difference between the full parity and 85 percent of parity, and if you actually made that stick and made the consumers of peanuts for edible purposes carry that burden, and sold to them, say, the 500,000 tons carrying a $24-per-ton tax, you would recapture $12,000,000 to bring back and apply against the $63,450,000 subsidy, giving you a net loss to the Government of, roughly, $51,450,000, under the concept I am here considering. A lower estimate of the total crop and more peanuts to the trade would change the figures.

I trust that those who are thoroughly familiar with this study, and particularly the gentleman from Georgia, will, if possible, refute all of these figures I am presenting, because if this is not the general approach, let us have the facts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CASE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes.

Mr. CASE. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the talk that the gentleman is making about peanuts, but I would not want the impression left that this bill deals only with peanuts. The wheat section is an important section, and it does not impose any penalties.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The only reason that I am putting all of my time on this question of peanuts is because I think we have reached the time in agricultural history and we have reached the hour in government when this Congress should know something more about this crop, and the type of legislation that we have been supporting here for 4 or 5 years in connection with this subject. That is why I am taking all of my time on this section of the bill.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The only reason for this legislation is the fact that the O. P. A. will not raise the price ceiling on oils. It could be done in another manner undoubtedly by the Department of Agriculture, but I should like to make it clear that this legislation is sought, and is necessary because they refused to do that down there.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Let me see if the gentleman does not agree with me in this. Is this not because of the step taken by the Committee on Appropriations within the last few days, to the effect that it is opposed to subsidizing farm prices generally? In other words, if this bill goes through in this form, we are giving from twenty to fifty million dollars, something like that, for the purpose of subsidizing peanuts, while the Appropriations Committee has gone on record as against the $100,000,000 subsidy.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. It is doing something by law that the Secretary of Agriculture and the Commodity Credit Corporation will do if the law is not passed. At the present time the Secretary has the power to suspend national marketing quotas for peanuts in time of national emergency. He could do that, and they would function the same way they function in respect to soy beans, flax, and so forth.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has again expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman the remainder of the time.

Mr. CRAWFORD. And may I ask the gentleman this question. I appreciate the information that he has given, but if we endorse this, as here presented, do we not in fact endorse something which the Appropriations Committee within the last few days has opposed, in going against the $100,000,000 subsidy.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The gentleman refers undoubtedly to the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations having in charge the agricultural bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then I ask a member of the Committee on Appropriations if that is not so.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Exactly so. We are making a back door approach, when the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations having in charge the agricultural appropriation bill, turned it down by a vote of 6 to 1.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I am not very strong for this peanut section, but irrespective of the action that we take here, if we defeat this, the Commodity Credit Corporation and the Department of Agriculture and the O. P. A. are going to pay these subsidies.

Mr. CRAWFORD. And that is a further reason why I say we have reached the hour when this Congress should understand what it is doing, not only with reference to peanuts, but with reference to other crops.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes.

Mr. HOPE. My position is the same as the gentleman's on subsidies, but I call his attention to the fact that there is not anything in this bill that establishes or creates subsidies. The subsidy that is being paid peanuts is paid under the act of July 1, 1941, reported out by the Banking and Currency Committee, giving the Secretary of Agriculture authority to establish floors under the price of certain commodities.

Mr. CRAWFORD. But the gentleman will agree that this bill puts the entire crop of a farmer under sec. 4 and works a double purpose, which is something that present law does not do.

Mr. HOPE. The only thing this bill does is to do away with the quotas on peanuts for 2 years. This puts the growers in the same class, if we pass this bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. For the next 2 years.

Mr. HOPE. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LYNDON B. JOHNSON].

Mr. LYNDON B. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LYNDON B. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LYNDON B. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, in the four terms that I have served in this House I have seldom asked your indulgence, but this morning we heard a most eloquent address by a great lady, Mme. Chiang Kai-shek, and she reminded us of the responsibility of this Congress in "pointing a way to a winning of the war." I want to discuss this afternoon very briefly action which this Congress could take next week that would do more to produce the weapons of warfare than anything that this Congress has done.

Today, when every plane, every tank, every rifle bullet counts, when the Nation is straining every nerve and sinew to supply these things to our armed forces in volume and in time, a most serious charge is being brought against American labor—a charge based on the high percentage of absenteeism now shown on the records of our war plants. I do not think that we can fling this blanket accusation against all American labor. I do not believe that we can lay the responsibility for this avoidable work failure upon the great body of loyal, patriotic Americans who are giving to the farthest limit of their energies and skills to produce the tools of war. Nine out of ten of these workers are giving of the best that is in them. I do not think, in fairness to them, that we can allow the tenth—the loafer, the inexcusable absentee, the slacker—to hide his own identity among them and by that means shift the burden of blame for his own personal act of disloyalty to the whole body. It is up to us to devise a means of finding out who is who, name by name—and once in possession of this knowledge, to disinfect our war plants of them—and our Selective Service has a very potent disinfectant for this type of vermin. Once this is accomplished, the great majority of our war workers will be given the exoneration which they so thoroughly deserve. To those who have made this exoneration necessary, we say, "The draft board will get you if you don't watch out."

"Absenteeism" is a fancy word for a very plain, very stark, very ugly situation. The plain, ugly fact is that we are not doing a good enough job of work to win this war. The workers in our war plants, for causes which we have not yet ascertained, are not on the job long enough, steady enough, reliably enough. The responsibility for this we have not yet placed. The reasons we have not yet plainly and accurately analyzed. All we do know is that we are not doing the job required of us and that "we" means not only the worker, where the first surface fault appears; it means, labor, management, and those of us in Government who are looked to for the home-front command.

America wants to know why this absenteeism, what to do about it, how to stop it. The "why" comes first. When we have the "know why," our Selective Service has a pretty effective "know how." The principle of work or fight is sound if wisely administered. It is a pretty persuasive argument. But it is effective only when we know what we are talking about, and setting about to do. In the hands of the ignorant and the malicious, it is a weapon that can hurt us worse than it hurts Hitler.

To date, aside from a great deal of loose talk on absenteeism from all sides, we have not found out the "why"of it. While we are stewing in an unsavory mixture of bias, while we listen to bickering and charges and countercharges, and endure the oratory of those who try to oppose the interests of the factory worker and the man in uniform when those interests are and will always remain the same—while all this heat is being generated, we are still without light.

Our Army needs soldiers but our soldiers need guns, and tanks, and ships. Upset the balance, take the labor force out of the plants that make these things, and you hurt us worse than you hurt Hirohito. The workers who can, will, and do produce these things must be kept on the job. If there are workers on that job who cannot, who will not, and who do not produce, we must find out why. When we know that, we are in a position to do one of two things:

First. Correct the conditions that are causing absenteeism where they can be corrected; and Second. Wherever the causes cannot be corrected, transfer the absentee workers into the armed forces.

It appears that we have both kinds. And it, therefore, appears that we have a task of picking and choosing. In fairness to the men in the armed forces, in fairness to the civilian population, and in fairness to the loyal patriotic majority of our war workers this picking and choosing must be accomplished. That is the sound application of the work or fight principle, as opposed to indiscriminate transfers into the armed forces regardless of the need of labor in the plant.

To accomplish such picking and choosing our local draft boards need guidance. They must have direct, explicit, individual information. They need to know the "why" in each case. Today they are wholly without any such guide. They must decide whether a man must fight without knowing whether he can work, and if we need the 10,000 bullets he can make, worse than we need the 10 Germans or 10 Japs he could kill, it does not make sense to shove him up front even for those 10 Germans or 10 Japs. Yesterday, as an opening wedge to crack this problem of absenteeism by a method of fact finding rather than fault finding, I introduced an amendment to a measure before the Committee on Naval Affairs. In principle, the amendment provides that—

> Each navy yard and station shall on or before the 10th day of March, June, September, and December of each year, file with the appropriate selective-service local board a verified statement setting forth:
> (1) The name of each employee subject to the jurisdiction of such selective-service local board who has been absent from his employment without prior authorization;
> (2) A brief description of the nature of the duties performed by such employee;
> (3) The period of time during which such absence continued; and
> (4) An expression of the opinion of the navy yard or station as to whether such absence was justified and, if so, the reasons therefor.

The committee adopted this amendment unanimously.

If that procedure is sound and profitable as applied to the civilian employees of the navy yards and stations, it is sound and profitable as applied to all workers or war contractors, or subcontractors—to each man in America to whom the principle of work or fight is applicable. I have, therefore, submitted for the consideration of this House a bill which broadens the field covered by the amendment introduced in the Naval Affairs Committee yesterday.

This measure provides that:

(a) Each employer who, pursuant to the terms of any contract, agreement, or arrangement with the Department of the Navy, is engaged in the production of goods, wares, merchandise, or anything of value for, or the furnishing of any service to, the Department of the Navy, shall on or before the 10th day of March, June, September, and December of each year file with the appropriate selective service local board a verified report setting forth:

First. The name of each employee subject to the jurisdiction of such selective service local board who has been absent from his employment without prior authorization by such employer;

Second. A brief description of the nature of the duties performed by such employee;

Third. The period of time during which such absence continued; and Fourth. A statement of fact setting forth the reasons therefor, together with any justification which the employee wishes to submit; and

(b) In the event that such employer enters into any contract, agreement, or arrangement with any other employer whereby such other employer in any manner whatsoever is to assist in or further the performance of the employer's contract, agreement, or arrangement with the Department of the Navy, such employer shall require as an express condition to the contract, agreement, or arrangement with such other employer that such other employer furnish to the appropriate selective-service local board the verified report required by subsection (a) hereof, and in any event such other employer shall furnish the verified report required by subsection (a) hereof.

The Selective Service Board must know its men, and the only thing that will enable it to do so is the record. What has this man done? How capable is he as a worker, and, above all just now, how often is he off the job and why? Those are the things our boards must know. Without them, the sound principle of work or fight becomes as haphazard as a lottery and as dangerous as a choice between two unlabeled bottles in a medicine chest.

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYNDON B. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. CREAL. While I am in sympathy with everything you say, will that not make another great detailed report to be filled out by the contractors?

Mr. LYNDON B. JOHNSON. May I say it does not involve another Government report. It merely involves the submission of a copy of the individual employee's time record.

Mr. HINSHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LYNDON B. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. I hope the gentleman does not think it is a punishment for a man who goes A. W. O. L. in industry to be allowed to serve in the armed forces of the United States. It seems to me it is a privilege to serve in the armed forces, and it should not be used as a punishment.

Mr. LYNDON B. JOHNSON. I certainly agree with the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the balance of the time.

Mr. Speaker, I want to take this time to congratulate the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LYNDON B. JOHNSON] upon the introduction of his bill, and since the gentleman seems to have the ear of those who control things, I hope he has some assurance that his legislation may receive the right-of-way, and that something may be done about it.

In that connection, Mr. Speaker, a week before Pearl Harbor I introduced a bill which would make it unlawful for sit-down strikes, for slow-downs, for strikes in war industries, and for conspiracies to bring about strikes. My bill, like the one introduced by the gentleman, would make these parties subject to the draft. I reintroduced that bill this year, a year after Pearl Harbor, and for over a year that bill has been nestled over in the Committee on Military Affairs. If I had any assurance that the gentlemen on the Naval Affairs Committee would give my bill some consideration I would like to have it referred to that committee.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. If we had jurisdiction over it we would act on it promptly. Let me make this statement for the information of the House. Absenteeism is one of the most serious problems confronting the Government today. In the month of December 1942 there were 12,700,000 man-hours lost on account of absenteeism. During the year 1942 only 170,000 hours were lost on account of strikes.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a reference to the bill to be considered under the pending rule?

Mr. COLMER. I am sorry; I cannot yield at this time.

Mr. BROOKS. We cannot discuss the rule that is going to be voted upon?

Mr. COLMER. I am sorry; I do not yield at this time.

I hope that the gentleman from Texas will join with me and those of us who have been pressing for some action upon this very serious matter which he has brought to your attention, and allied things in connection therewith. I again want to commend him for the very splendid stand he has taken. I know one reason why he has taken it is because he flew in a plane as a member of the armed forces of this country in the South Pacific and saw what was going on over there. He got the soldier's point of view. The gentleman from Texas saw the suffering, the bleeding, and the dying which was going on over there by our soldiers and sailors. He learned that there was no absenteeism by our men over there, no striking, no slowing down. And now the gentleman wants something done about it. I wish every Member of this House could go over there as the gentleman from Texas did, and I am sure then we could do something about it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include certain statements and excerpts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AMENDING THE AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT OF 1938

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1605) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, with respect to farm-acreage allotments, the farm marketing excess of wheat, the use of excess corn as silage for feed to livestock on the farm, to provide for the adequate supply of peanuts for oil and other uses, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 1605, with Mr. MAGNUSON in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for an inquiry?

Mr. FULMER. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Insofar as I know, the preponderant number of members of the Agriculture Committee are for this bill, but there are some of us, of course, who oppose certain sections. I am wondering what we are going to do about a disposition of time. I think those who are opposed ought to be yielded some time on this matter and that a suitable arrangement should be made by those who control the time. We should not like to be foreclosed from presenting our side of the case.

Mr. FULMER. May I say to the gentleman from Illinois that the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] controls 1 hour to be used as he sees fit, and I control 1 hour on this side. I want to be fair to everybody so far as I can with the time allotted to me.

Mr. Chairman, I want to analyze the bill briefly, and I hope the Members will give serious thought to the real purpose of this bill and what it is intended to do at a time when we are short millions of tons of fats and oils, when Russia and other countries engaged in the war on the side of the United States today, are begging for oils not to cook with but to spread on their bread.

The purpose of the first section of the bill—and this appears on page 2—is in the nature of protecting certain farmers who are operating under legislation previously passed governing quotas of certain basic crops where these farmers were assigned definite quotas. The first section of this bill provides that should any of these quota farmers be called into the service or should they plant other crops requested during the duration of the war, so badly needed at this time, that after the war is over they will not lose their quotas to which they would otherwise have been entitled had they continued planting their full quotas for the duration. This applies also in the case of those farmers who cannot plant the acreage required because of labor shortage or other reasons beyond their control. The second provision of the bill is in line with a bill I introduced last session, and that Congress passed and which was vetoed by the President of the United States, which had for its purpose permitting farmers who had certain penalty wheat on hand that came under the provision of the Agricultural Adjustment Act to feed that surplus wheat to their own livestock, poultry, cattle, hogs, and so forth, without any penalty. Under this provision farmers can utilize any penalty wheat on hand carried over from 1941–42 and for the duration. The third provision of the bill proposes to permit farmers who are operating under the soil-conservation program being limited in planting certain crops to plant additional corn acreage without penalty, to be used as silage to help in this great emergency in feeding cattle for slaughter and dairy cattle.

The fourth provision is the peanut provision. I regret exceedingly that some of the Members who have already spoken on the rule have made statements that apparently are altogether out of line with the real facts and the real purpose of the bill. There would not be any use of bringing in this bill, Mr. Chairman, if it were not for the fact that certain peanut growers in a number of States have been operating under a quota system and have already voted quotas for 3 years—1942, 1943, and 1944. Under the quota system they received in 1942 a price anywhere from $140 to $160 per ton for peanuts to be used as edible peanuts.

Last year the Secretary of Agriculture begged farmers to plant and produce all the peanuts they could for oil because of the tremendous shortage of oil, and that they would be guaranteed $82 a ton. Farmers with quotas and many other farmers planted peanuts for oil purposes but those farmers found they could not produce peanuts for $82 a ton. Peanuts call for considerable fertilizer and they are very destructive to the soil. Some months ago we worked out a program with the Department that those quota farmers would relinquish their quotas and nonquota farms plant and produce all the peanuts possible and they would be guaranteed 90 percent of parity, one price to all farmers, about $130 per ton.

Something has been said about a subsidy in connection with this bill. Mr. Chairman, I am as much opposed to a subsidy as any Member of this House, but let me point out to you this: We are in one of the greatest emergencies ever experienced in the history of this country and, take it from me, we can keep on quibbling and fighting and at the end of this year we are going to wind up with not enough food to feed our own people, our own soldiers, let alone being able to furnish our allies tons and tons of food that they need so badly and will continue to need if we are going to win this war. Russia, where they are splendidly fighting our fight and saving the lives of many of our boys, is begging for more food.

According to my understanding of the bill, there is no provision or even a request for a subsidy. The gentleman from Georgia, who will close this debate, is well posted on peanut legislation and the real purpose of this bill and I beg you to listen to him as I have allotted him plenty of time to explain the bill, as well as answer your questions.

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULMER. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOPE. The gentleman mentioned what I was going to ask him—if there is any subsidy in this bill. Of course, he has correctly stated that there is not. May I ask him if it is not true that whatever subsidy may be paid on peanuts or upon any one of perhaps 15 or 20 different crops, the production of which we are seeking to increase, will be paid entirely by a different piece of legislation?

Mr. FULMER. The gentleman is absolutely correct. May I state under this bill the farmer who has a quota will yield his quota, as well as the parity quota price, and accept the $130, which will amount to millions of dollars, and the difference saved on the edible peanuts and the average price 90 percent of parity for all peanuts, the Commodity Credit Corporation tells me, will take only about $25,000,000 additional money to make payments of 90 percent of parity, and they have not indicated at any time that they will come to Congress for a single dime; and if so, it will be up to the Appropriations Committee of this House and not this bill or my committee.

Mr. Chairman, I have served in this Congress for 22 years, and I have endeavored to be impartial and fair to every Member of this House and every section of this country by introducing and advocating legislation for the best interest of all the farmers of this country. My committee is interested in and responsible for the passage of legislation that is fair and in the best interest of all farmers, and it is the responsibility of the Appropriations Committee should the Department of Agriculture or any other department come in at any time and call for funds. That is the time for those who are interested in subsidies to make their fight if you want to take the chance of losing this war by defeating an increased production of food.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULMER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Does not the gentleman feel that the quicker we get away from the subsidy idea and substitute for it a fair price for what the farmer gets for his produce and his goods the quicker we will attain the goal which we hope to attain in the food-for-victory program?

Mr. FULMER. I agree with the gentleman, but, as I stated, they are planting peanuts now in Georgia and Texas and they are wondering what we are going to do about this. I wonder if there is a single Member of the House who can tell me that we have any chance whatever to remedy many of the serious situations confronting us in various departments and agencies here in Washington at this time. In the midst of this great emergency, I may say to the gentlemen that I am anxious for the time to come that we may revamp various pieces of legislation passed during the past years, as well as put an end to a great many things that are going on, but I say to you that in the midst of this emergency when we may wake up this year with not food enough to feed our own soldiers and civilians, let alone our allies, we better do the best we can to bring about a production which we are not going to have unless we remedy the serious labor situation on the farm and see to it that farmers receive fair prices, even subsidies or incentive payments, during this emergency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST].

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, at this time I do not propose to talk about the bill generally. I do wish, however, to speak about section 2 of the bill with reference to wheat and especially call attention to what I think is a remarkable decision of the Supreme Court of the United States of America on wheat.

You know we passed a bill providing for penalties for those who sold an excess amount of wheat. They were allotted so much and if they sold in excess of that or fed to their own livestock in excess they were penalized, as it turned out, 49 cents a bushel. They were not permitted to raise wheat on their own farms and feed it to their own chickens or hogs or cattle in excess of the quota unless they paid a penalty for the excess of 49 cents.

Many people were dissatisfied with that and they took the matter into the courts. A United States District Court in Ohio decided the case of Wickard against Filburn, which finally went up to the United States Supreme Court, and on the 9th day of last November the Supreme Court decided that case, and passed down a remarkable decision and one which should invite your attention.

The Court held in that case that even though one has engaged in growing a product or vegetable on his own farm, and even though the farmer was thereby engaging in a local endeavor, and even though it could not be regarded as commerce, yet under certain conditions the Congress of the United States under the interstate commerce clause could regulate such endeavor. Let me illustrate it this way: If I go through my potato patch and plant or drop potatoes every foot—if you had been a boy with me on the farm you would have planted potatoes—I am then and there engaged in a local thing. I am not engaged in interstate commerce. I am not engaged in commerce at all, but this Supreme Court has held that even though such endeavor may not be regarded as commerce it may still, whatever its nature, be reached by the Congress under the commerce clause, if my endeavor exerts a substantial economic effect on interstate commerce, and this irrespective of a thing that has heretofore been held in all of the interstate commerce cases, and definitions, namely, that the thing I am doing must have a direct effect on interstate commerce. But on November 9 the Court held that that was not so any longer, and especially called attention to the former cases, but went on to distinguish such former cases, and said that if my endeavor exerted a substantial effect on interstate commerce even though it was a local endeavor, and even though it could not be regarded as commerce, still it could be regulated by Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution if it exerted a substantial effect upon commerce—

Whether said effect is what at some earlier period has been defined as direct or indirect, still the Congress has authority to regulate.

That has marked a new definition of interstate commerce and will result in extending the powers of Congress immeasurably. Under this particular decision those who raise wheat and feed it to their own cattle or hogs or chickens on their own farm were held to be engaged in interstate commerce and amenable to the laws of Congress and were required to pay 49 cents penalty per bushel.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, this irrespective of what the results of that thing would be. I am not particularly anxious about this so far as it relates to the bill now before us, only to say that in this wheat provision the Committee has provided that a man may raise wheat and feed it to his own chickens or his own cattle without being subject to that 49 cents penalty.

I should like to talk a little further about this decision. I call it to your attention because it is certainly a new thing in our jurisprudence to say that when I raise my own wheat and feed it to my own chickens I am engaging in interstate commerce and am subject to the control of Congress, if this thing that I am doing exerts a substantial economic effect on interstate commerce, and this irrespective of whether such effect is what at some earlier time had been known as direct or indirect.

I now quote from the decision as follows:

Even if appellant's activity be local and though it may not be regarded as commerce, it may still, whatever its nature, be reached by Congress if it exerted a substantial economic effect on interstate commerce and this irrespective of whether such effect is what at some earlier time had been defined as "direct" or "indirect."

I shall talk if I am allowed time about other features of the bill later.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES].

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MAGNUSON). The Chair will count. [After counting.] 110 Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I take a little bit of satisfaction today in observing that this great Committee on Agriculture of the House that has heretofore opposed recommending amendments to permit farmers to feed what is known as excess wheat to livestock and poultry, without penalty payments; and to permit excess corn to be put in silos free of penalties, now favors the passage of these measures. I am glad to see it. The majority of the committee did not see fit to support me when I tried to get similar legislation through the House 2 years ago, and 1 year ago.

One of the most unreasonable things this House has done in the past, and I am glad they see fit to change it, is to say to a farmer, "Because you happened to raise a little more wheat than the program set by your Government fixed for you, you cannot feed it to your own chickens or your own hogs or your own cattle without paying 49 cents a bushel penalty on it." And, by the way, if this measure is not passed, the penalty will be more than 49 cents next year.

This is absurd, and we should get rid of such a restriction immediately. Right now with an acute shortage of meat, when we need to feed this livestock to produce more cattle and to produce more hogs farmers are sitting back with excess wheat in their bins that they cannot feed to their own hogs unless they pay the penalty. They have to buy other feed, because of this law that was put on the statute books and the Supreme Court has upheld.

I am going to offer an amendment at the proper time, to repeal the penalty provisions of the law with respect to so-called excess wheat. Here we are on the one hand saying to the farmers, "You ought to produce more and more food." Then we turn right around and fix ceiling prices and say, "Of course, you cannot go any higher than a certain amount on the product." And furthermore warn them if they attempt to produce too much wheat, there will be a penalty for doing it.

In view of the acute demand for food, I fail to see how restriction on the production of food and restriction on the price of it go together. And yet, assess and penalize the farmer who raises more wheat than the amount allotted to him by his Government. It ought to be observed that, as I said before, the penalty will not be 49 cents a bushel this year but somewhere between 50 and 60 cents a bushel.

Somebody is going to say, "Why, it is perfectly all right, because we have so much wheat on hand." Yet we are told on the other hand how thousands and thousands of people throughout the world are starving because they do not have food. Here we are, offering and delivering food to people who are in want, and need it to sustain life itself, and yet restrict its production. Mind you, it will not be long until we will not have a surplus of wheat. Not with the program ahead of us. So I say to you it is not right, it is not fair to penalize anybody for raising too much food at this time. I trust that if you view this situation as I do, you will support my amendment. I should add, that my amendment does not change the present law that restricts loans, parity payments, insurance benefits, and soil conservation payments to those who want to comply with the restrictions of the law. It simply means, that if a farmer decides to raise more wheat than his restricted quota, he will not be compelled to pay a penalty in addition thereto.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I had the impression that this bill carried a provision that would do what the gentleman says he desires to do.

Mr. REES of Kansas. It does not. This bill simply states that a man can feed his own wheat to his own livestock and poultry just during the war period, and after that it goes out. The other section permits farmers to put their excess corn in the silo, without being considered as excess corn.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Does the gentleman desire the quota removed, so that we may produce all we can produce?

Mr. REES of Kansas. Absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL].

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Chairman, several years ago I stood in the Well of the House and with tears literally running down my cheeks asked that some action be taken to relieve the hard-pressed farmers of my district. They were completely bereft of hay and other sustenance feeds, due to the fact that a terrible flood had raged through that territory and also that my section of the country had suffered from one of the most devastating droughts ever known.

I proposed at that time that the farmers be subsidized to the extent of transporting hay and other fodders into my section so that they would be able to keep their dairy herds alive and continue to raise these herds which were producing the milk consumed by the metropolitan districts of the State in which I live.

Since then I have departed somewhat from that philosophy, the philosophy of subsidizing the farmers throughout the country. I have come to the conclusion that, if the farmer were able to obtain a decent and wholesome price for the goods he produces, he would be able to exist, regardless of whether the Government paid him for raising this crop or curtailing the production of that crop.

I am in hearty agreement with the points the gentleman from Kansas [Mr.

HOPE] has emphasized and with those that the gentleman from Minnesota has mentioned regarding wheat and corn penalties. I believe the farmer ought to be able to feed his surplus wheat to the livestock on his farm. I also think that in the case of the gentleman from Minnesota he ought to be able to feed his surplus silage to the stock on his farm.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GILCHRIST. The bill does not provide that the silage must be fed to the stock on the farm or stock owned by the farmer.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. The gentleman will recall we had several discussions on that in the committee meeting, and I think the gist of the thought was that it would give consideration to the livestock on the farmer's particular property.

Mr. GILCHRIST. But this administration does not go by the thought behind closed doors of a committee.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I am talking about what is in the bill.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Yes.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. In reply to the gentleman from Iowa, I would say that section 305 of the bill provides that the corn-harvested silage is fed as fodder corn feed to livestock on the farm.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Chairman, I cannot yield further. As I have said, I have departed from the philosophy of subsidies, and I think it is high time that the Department of Agriculture got down to business and tried to interpret some of the laws that this Congress has passed. I think it is high time that we woke up to the fact that the bureaucrats are running hog wild.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Yes.

Mr. HALLECK. The thing that disturbs me is where the end will be in any subsidy program. Just the other day our Committee on Small Business listened to representatives of the packing industry, and one of the alternatives suggested for them is that the Government subsidize them in their operations, to the end that they continue in business. I wonder where the gentleman thinks we are going to stop.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. The gentleman is correct. I agree with him thoroughly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 minute more.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. I hear a good deal of condemnation on the floor of bureaucrats. Now, the people of this country are not going to look to bureaucrats to solve these problems. This is a responsibility of Congress. Let us lay the blame where it belongs and stop blaming the bureaucrats.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Then I will say that it is up to the Congress during this session to take action, as we have in the past 2 weeks. We have started in the right direction, but I am frank to say that I think there is plenty of room for improvement. As time goes on we should make every effort to prevent the progress of these bureaucrats.

Mr. GRANGER. I wonder if the gentleman has changed his mind about subsidies because the farmers in his district at the moment do not happen to suffer from the drought.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. If the gentleman wants to put it in that is all right, but I guess other Members are guilty of the same thing. They were not particularly interested at this time because their sections are not affected as was mine.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG].

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, I confess a great distaste to find myself in a position called upon as I am to vote for a measure which, in the first instance, is for the relief of the producers of an agricultural commodity from which oil is made. Oil is a war material, and in this case this bill is here because of farm conditions that could have been avoided, but which, as a matter of fact, come from a situation which arises out of the efforts and impact of our own Government upon agriculture. If one but analyzes for a moment the price which the Office of Price Administration fixed upon peanut oil—and I do not know where they got the formula upon which they based the price—you will find it based upon the formula which set a price from which it was impossible for the farmers to expect to get more for their oil from peanuts than about $82 a ton, which is about 55 percent of parity. Think of it. The Congress wrote definitely into the price-control law a prohibition on the fixing of a ceiling on any agricultural product that would reflect to the farmer a ceiling price below a definite price per ton considerably above 55 percent of parity. Here we are called upon to consider the passage of an act which is occasioned by only one thing and that is a set of wheels within wheels, built by a combination between those who desire to control and the earnest and misguided friends of the farmer who voted for the legislation. I am trying to call back to you the situation. It is perfectly patent that in time of war, above all times, every patriotic citizen should be given an opportunity, unabridged, to do his dead-level best to serve his country in whatever line of effort he happens to be engaged, particularly in those lines of effort where in the case of priorities, if we take first things first, the first priority should exist not only in the form of relief from bondage, but as a matter of fact, if priorities had been started on the basis of first things first, the first priority would have been granted to the plow. In 5 minutes one has no time in which to discuss a matter from the standpoint I desire to discuss this legislation, because I want to go into the fundamentals. If you vote against this bill you are confronted with this proposition. You are actually and effectively hampering a war effort, because certainly no man should be expected to produce a commodity at a price which is far below the cost of production.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KLEBERG. I cannot yield now. I do not think we ought to investigate anybody, just to be doing something. There ought to be a reason for it. But there is in this bill a provision providing for the sale of oil-producing peanuts only to certain designated Government agencies, under the guise that those agencies are cooperative. I call your attention earnestly to the fact that if the truth were known and the facts brought into the full light of an American day, in the eyes of Americans fully awake to conditions here at home, the cooperative proposition might develop into a complete change of adjectives, and the ugly word of conspiracy for purposes of monopoly, might well be substituted for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I say with great reluctance that I am afraid I shall have to oppose this bill, it contains so many strange and abstruse provisions. My principal contention is that in this bill we set up several devices for torpedoing the basic 1938 Agricultural Adjustment Act. If production is our goal, if we need production for war purposes, why does not the committee bring us a bill to simply take off the restrictions for a limited period and say to the farmers, "Go ahead and produce to your heart's content." But look what we have here. We propose now to say to the wheat farmers that where they have grown too much wheat and they feed their excess wheat on the farm, the penalty will be adjusted or it will be reduced. So it is in competition with other cereal grains, particularly grains used for feed.

Secondly, there is a provision in this bill, and a permanent provision it is to be, which alters the 1938 act with regard to putting corn in silage. It is not for the duration. It is a permanent change in the 1938 act. So we say to the farmers, particularly in the noncommercial corn areas, "If you grow too much corn, if you exceed your marketing quotas, you can dump it into a silage tank and you can feed it that way," and in consequence you are developing, it seems to me, an unfair advantage against those farmers in the commercial corn-producing areas who just have to take the tail with the hide, and who have but a single outlet for their corn. Is this fair to patriotic corn farmers who are willing to make every sacrifice and supreme effort with other sections of the Nation?

We had that proposal up before. It was offered by the gentleman from Minnesota in April 1941. We defeated it in this House by a vote of 89 to 32. Here is the old ghost back again. Frankly, I cannot go along with a permanent change in the 1938 act which will be looming up like a great tower some day when normalcy returns and we do not have this dislocation for feed, fats, and fibers.

So it is a disturbing provision to me.

Finally, I am disturbed about section 4. I will tell you how I think section 4 is going to work out. It is going to work out precisely as it has worked out for soya beans. The Commodity Credit Corporation is going to take over this crop. How else will they provide these guaranteed prices to producers unless they do?

Then no matter how you utilize peanuts, whether you buy them for edible purposes or whether they are put between the crushers and squeezed into oil, this says, regardless of their utilization, the producer shall be paid at prices determined by the Secretary at not less than 55 percent of parity. Why? Because the O. P. A. refuses to raise the ceiling. What a strange thing that is. Here is an agency we created that refuses to do justice by the peanut growers, so it is alleged, so we put our tails between our legs and confess that because they refuse to do it we have to go on the back track and do something else.

I am not going to make that kind of confession, but I will tell you how it will work out. The Commodity Credit Corporation will take over the crop. They will sell one-third of it to the people who roast peanuts and they will make a profit on it. I will give you the figures I have. We will sell one-third to the edible trade and on that we will make a profit of $20,000,000. On that portion sold to the oil trade we will lose $60,000,000. So in consequence the net loss is going to be $40,000,000. We doubled the peanut crop once before by taking off the quotas and giving them a little better price. Mr. Wickard made that confession to us in the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill the other day. It seems to me it is high time to get sensible about this program and do the right thing. Let these prices go up and then say to the farmers, "Go ahead and produce to your heart's content," and they will take care of all the war needs and the needs of our soldiers and the needs of lease-lend.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOPE. I am much in agreement with what the gentleman has said as far as the fats-and-oils program is concerned, but the gentleman knows, as I know, that as far as soybeans is concerned the program which he describes is being carried out without any such legislation as we have here affecting peanuts, and I am sure he also realizes that whether we pass this peanut provision in this bill the Commodity Credit Corporation will still go ahead and carry out the program along the same lines that he has described.

Mr. DIRKSEN. May I ask my friend at this point if that is the case, then why is this bill here?

Mr. HOPE. The only reason this bill is here is in order to do away with the quota system on peanuts for the next 2 years so as to put all peanut producers upon the same basis as far as prices are concerned.

Mr. DIRKSEN. But there is an emergency provision in the 1938 act which would give the Secretary such authority as he needs, if he thinks he needs it.

Mr. HOPE. There is a provision in my judgment and it could be used. It might be used if we do not pass the legislation. I do not know, of course.

Mr. DIRKSEN. So I say to my friend, with tolerance, I do not know why the Secretary of Agriculture should be passing the buck back to Congress constantly; either let him administer the act or not administer it. That is the way we should do it.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. HOPE. The gentleman made some reference to the provision dealing with wheat, and I am sure that he has noted that that is only for the period of the emergency.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct.

Mr. HOPE. But at the time the need is for livestock feed.

Mr. DIRKSEN. But the silage provision is for everything after 1943; it is a permanent amendment to the act of 1938.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I will concede that the gentleman is correct on the corn silage provision; it is permanent legislation.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is correct.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. But does the gentleman know that just a short time ago the Secretary of Agriculture offered a loan provision in the noncommercial corn areas equivalent to the loan provision prevailing in the commercial corn areas?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; and I think the thing is wrong. As I read it, it merely means that they have all the emergency authority they need to raise such corn as they need out there.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I wish the gentleman would raise a little hob with the Secretary for giving the noncommercial farmers the commercial corn rate instead of stopping the thousands of small dairy farmers throughout the country from raising enough feed.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I share the solicitude of my friend from Minnesota as he raises his voice for the folks back home.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CREAL].

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Chairman, it is not often, but I find myself this time not in complete accord with my friend from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], on the question of silage which has been before this House and has been before our committee and at times voted down. It comes up, gets by, and gets to the House, gets voted down; then it comes back again, like the cat with nine lives.

Along with that proposition the question of precedent is always a dangerous thing. Down in my area a man who raises a lot of corn hardly ever sells any corn; he just buys more hogs and feeds it to the hogs. All right, if you are going to let them grow corn for silage for cattle in Minnesota why should not the Kentucky farmer be enabled on the rich river bottoms to double, treble, or quadruple his corn crops and feed it to his hogs? Can you show me any reason why not? The dairy cattle is for profit; the hog is for profit. Look at that discrimination. I cannot go along on that silage proposition for the dairy farmers in other areas; that is an unfair advantage. It is dairyman discriminating against dairyman.

But there is a fact you overlook: There is no use condemning the law as a whole; it is not your law; you merely submitted a referendum to the people. Everyone of these items in here was voted for by a majority, a substantial majority, of the farmers themselves, in some areas more than 90 percent. You can take the referendum away from them if you want to, but they voted it, not you. You merely gave them the power of voting like they would in any other election. It is their law, and in none of these commodities where they have ever voted for quotas have they ever expressed by resolution or otherwise any intention of wanting to undo it. We merely voted for the referendum. So there is one thing from which I beg to be excused when you condemn Congress for this law, when you submitted only a referendum.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CREAL. I yield.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Is the gentleman opposed to an amendment to this measure that would permit a farmer to put his own corn, green corn, in his silo to feed to his livestock and not include it in the quota? Is there anything wrong about that?

Mr. CREAL. Yes; unless you allow them to feed it to his other stock, poultry, hogs, or sheep, jackasses, or what not; but this would be limited just to silage.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CREAL. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Is not the crux of this whole thing the fact that we give him that power and still pay them parity?

Mr. CREAL. Exactly.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Still give him the loan value.

Mr. CREAL. I claim that it is an unfair advantage over his fellow dairymen in other sections, over others who had raised corn, not to let it be fed to other than dairy cattle.

Mr. REES of Kansas. But the gentleman understands there is no loan on this ensilage we are talking about; it is just green feed. I do not believe the gentleman ever had anything to do with filling silos and feeding all kinds of feeds in a practical way.

Mr. CREAL. My section has plenty of silos full of silage, and I have not had any of those farmers writing me and asking me for this law for a special privilege herein proposed to be granted to only one kind of corn growers.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CREAL. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BECKWORTH. The gentleman is on the Committee on Agriculture. I am interested particularly in the provisions pertaining to peanuts.

Mr. CREAL. I am not capable of discussing that subject at all. Other members on the committee from peanut-growing areas will explain that section.

Mr. BECKWORTH. I hope somebody will discuss it.

Mr. CREAL. They will.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CREAL. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HALLECK. The gentleman referred to the referenda among the farmers. As I understand, there has never been any vote on corn quotas; that is, the corn farmers have never voted in any referendum election.

Mr. CREAL. I believe the gentleman is right; but on the wheat that was discussed here so much, you did, and on tobacco.

Mr. HALLECK. The compulsory quotas which were first provided for in the 1938 revision have never been invoked in respect to the production of corn.

Mr. CREAL. Very well. Those people have foregone the raising of corn in order to get their soil payments. Every Member should be for section 1, and I have no objection to section 4. My main objection is to section 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER].

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, this bill has three distinct and separate parts. It is not wholly a peanut bill. One part deals with wheat, another part deals with corn, and another part deals with peanuts. Possibly the Members coming from wheat-producing districts, such as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE], will rightfully be advocating the bill largely because it is beneficial to wheat. The commercial corn-district Members, like the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] will be opposing it because their districts are interested in commercial corn—selling corn as corn. They see in the bill an advantage given the user of silage over the seller of the corn. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN] and the other representatives of great dairy districts will be for the part of the bill which gives silage the greatest benefit. So that after all is said and done, I venture the suggestion that possibly this bill is on the floor today because the peanut representatives on the Agriculture Committee were willing to accept the corn provisions and the wheat provisions as a condition precedent to including the peanut provision, and likewise the corn and wheat representatives were willing to accept the peanut provisions in order to get consideration for the staple agricultural products of their respective bailiwicks.

In fact, the Committee on Rules was told by members of the Committee on Agriculture that this bill should come to the floor where it might be considered and amended. One Member appeared before the Committee on Rules and called the bill a three-headed monster, and while favoring the rule opposed the bill.

So, for the benefit of the new Members, who have not gone through the debates in connection with the A. A. A. as it affects the various crops and sections of the country, let me suggest to you that when a Member makes his argument for or against a particular provision of the bill you give weight to whether or not he is speaking largely for his district or for the country as a whole. I am not criticizing a Member who is an advocate of the best interests of his own district. That is his duty, but in the final analysis we must appraise the entire field and vote for the greatest good to the greatest number of our people. If the corn section of the bill does not meet that specification, then it should be eliminated and the same treatment should be accorded the wheat and the peanut provisions. There is some good in the bill and let us preserve that good.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. STEWART].

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Chairman, I have studied this bill from every angle, the laws on the lawbooks, and what the bill contemplates. I do not see why we should work up to the point of worrying about subsidy, where a few peanut farmers and wheat farmers and other kinds of farmers should be the benefactors of the Government, and get excited about it. I do not know of any business in America that has not at some time had something handed to it by the National Treasury. Farm conditions are deplorable. We have a shortage of feed for cattle and a shortage of food for people. We should encourage more farming from every angle, and support every law, with as little bureaucratic interference as possible, to aid agriculture. I do not want you to put in this bill any of these menus the Department of Agriculture was asking to be prescribed for Mexican labor, in the case of the gentleman from California [Mr. ELLIOTT].

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEWART. Yes.

Mr. BECKWORTH. The gentleman has made a good statement with reference to not restricting the farmer further. Can the gentleman tell me whether the farmer who proposes to plant these peanuts can buy his feed from any source?

Mr. STEWART. Oh, you cannot buy a pound of feed or a plow clevice without living up to an O. P. A. order in my part of the State. We do not know how to use baling wire, but we have got to the point where most of the farm boys are in the Army. The problem is, Where are you going to get people to carry on the work on the farm? Are we going to get them out of drug stores or law offices or blacksmith shops, and can we make farmers out of them? That is the problem. The farmers make good soldiers. He does not have to stay over here as a military police, but they just give the farm boy a gun, and he gets out into the fight to win.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEWART. No; the gentleman will pardon me. I have not the time. I had several things that I wanted to touch upon. I was amused at my friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL], when he said that 5 years ago he stood for subsidy. I remember that every bank stood for it, and every industry stood for it, and everybody else was on his knees, begging for help. I remember that back in those days the stock of the present Executive was very high, but, like other things, when we get back to where we can do business ourselves, we want it turned back to us, and we want to enjoy a free market. The law of supply and demand is still the rule that we eventually hope to follow. We cannot continue to depend upon the Government to live in a Garden of Eden and let South America feed us, so everybody can run for Congress and drive a 12-cylinder limousine. Some of us have to work more than 40 hours a week, at least during this emergency, and the people I represent put in from 70 to 96 hours a week in the agricultural areas. There are coal mines and oil fields also, and now let us all unite. Do not you boys go wrong on this bill, because you stand for the gold standard in your own mind as the medium on which to base the dollar, and that high tariff is protection—do not you boys go off on a tangent, but let everybody be a good fellow, and let us vote for the good of the country. Let us disregard this center aisle. That is what I am trying to do. I am going to offer an amendment to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CLEVENGER].

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Chairman, I come from a section of America where agriculture is a business and a science, but, gentlemen, my section of the country has suffered from malpractice in agriculture in various other districts of the United States—single cropping. Of course farmers suffered in other places of the United States, and in some places it was cotton, other places corn, induced by land speculations in the Great Plains States. Some places it was tobacco and other places it was wheat, but those three crops are the worst offenders—always the result of single cropping and soil mining. Many of you will remember that from the districts east of the Ohio River there was very little demand for this farm legislation, for we follow sound crop practice and conserve our soil. The rest east of Illinois largely followed the same sound practice. It is the practice in Pennsylvania and New York, and there would have been very little demand for crop regulation from the rest of the country had they been practicing crop rotation and soil building all of these years. I want to take you down the road a little ways on this oil problem, take you back a couple of years. You remember the time we had 4½ cents on hogs in 1940. That was about exactly the price of a pound of imported vegetable oil, plus the duty. It was about 4½ cents that it cost to bring in palm oil and coconut oil, cottonseed oil from Brazil, and so forth. It set the price of hogs and thus the price of our corn. It brought distress and distress brought legislative panaceas.

I want some of you to remember when this 10,000,000 acres of peanuts is expanded as recommended what problems we are going to have. In 1940 they came here and got the restriction on a million and a half acres, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] has told us that it is well to extend it to somewhere around 10,000,000 acres. Gentlemen, Henderson Field is right in the middle of Lever Brothers' coconut grove. It may be pleasant during the war to have these oils, but I say to you men from the Corn Belt you may see cheaper hogs than $4.40 because the duty is gone now. It will come in duty free.

I am going to offer an amendment to this second section of the bill to make permanent this right of a man to feed this wheat on the farms where it is produced—not just during the war emergency. If this were not a war emergency I would be down here today asking you to junk the whole A. A. A. program during the war. If you do not want to take my word for it, go back and check commodity prices a week before the World War broke out in 1939. You will find that the price of wheat at Liverpool was the lowest since the day of Queen Elizabeth. It was kept at 55 cents a bushel on our western farms by a subsidy averaging 28 cents per bushel in 1939. You have not felt the full result of this ill-advised farm legislation that we have been fooling with. The war came, and that was a shock absorber. When the test comes, you will get the full impact of it.

As a man who was born on a ranch and who has grown up in the Great Plains States and spent 25 years of my life in Ohio, I am somewhat conversant with these conditions in the various districts. I say to you I did not support this bill. The chairman will tell you that after listening to all these arguments, this plea for oil and winning the war, I voted "present but bewildered." And I am still bewildered. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] came very close to the truth. Here you have two or three thin slices of turkey—one of silage corn, one of feed wheat, and the other peanuts. I am afraid there is an awful lot of turkey buzzard in the peanut part of this bill, and we are going to be asked to eat the buzzard in order to get the turkey.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLEVENGER. I yield.

Mr. REES of Kansas. The gentleman goes along with me, I believe, in favor of the sections dealing with the feeding of ensilage and making it permanent?

Mr. CLEVENGER. Absolutely.

Mr. REES of Kansas. And also on the feeding of wheat to livestock?

Mr. CLEVENGER. Certainly. It is the most effective way to meet the corn-borer menace also. It disposes of the stocks where the pest hibernates; it is most essential to the dairy people, and we need dairy products.

Mr. REES of Kansas. I think the gentleman knows I have tried to get this through the House for the last couple of years, but does not the gentleman agree that this is the time to take off the penalties and allow the people to raise more wheat?

Mr. CLEVENGER. Oh, yes. Take the hobbles off of them and you will not be talking about a famine. Give them the machines and the men and let them alone. Three hundred thousand full-time and part-time men, like termites, are eating the arms off of the farmers of this country. They should be mobilized for work or fighting. Set the farmers free and they will feed you, and feed you with plenty. Let us take the hobbles off the farmers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROSS].

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, I have a saying back home when I meet fellows who try to be smart, "Well, you are not dumb. You are just acting dumb." I think there never was a time when I could apply that to the Committee on Agriculture and to this House as I can right now. I cannot see why the Committee on Agriculture cannot once and for all lay selfish interests and community interests aside and come out here and scrap the whole A. A. A. program from beginning to end. There is no room for it. There is no need for it. There is no economy in it today. We talk about food. If we have plenty of corn and wheat in this country that will mean more eggs, more butter, milk and more food all around. I am afraid, through selfish interests, we are cutting our noses off to spite our faces.

Down in the Agricultural Department it is dominated by fellows such as were spoken of the other day in California, where they tried to set a ceiling price on eggs and milk. The man from the O. P. A. said, "Well, you fellows are not fair." When asked to explain his statement, he said, "You are not taking into consideration the eggs you get from your broilers and your capons."

Now, that would be funny if it were not tragic, but that is what we get from these long-haired boys downtown. The actions of this House should be on a little higher plane.

I always credited the Committee on Agriculture with being a lot of good, honest men, with the interests of the country at heart, but today I find myself completely confused. I find the people of the country confused. What we need today to win the war is a green light for the farmers to produce the crops to feed the world.

This bill provides for subsidies to produce more of some grains and penalties for producing others. In my neighborhood in 1942 I have known farmers with 30 acres of wheat who paid as much as $200 penalty for overproduction. As the law now stands a farmer who wants to may get one check for producing and another for producing less. This just does not make sense and the farmers know it. They don't want this money and they don't want to pay a penalty. They simply want to be left alone to live their lives and farm their farms as only they know how.

If they were allowed to do this and were permitted to have equipment which they sorely need, and experienced help to operate that equipment, the fear of a food shortage would be eliminated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURRAY].

OUR DOMESTIC FOOD POLICY

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, we have had the Atlantic Charter, Lend-Lease, and the "four freedoms," and master agreements in the consideration of our foreign policy, but we do not appear to have a very well defined charter for our domestic programs, which are unalterably tied up with our foreign policy. There is no use in talking about lend-lease as far as food is concerned unless we have some produced food with which to do the lease-lending.

I asked for this time today to bring before you one of the most far-reaching pieces of agricultural legislation which has come before us for some time. What we do with H. R. 1605 should be indicative, not only of the opinions of Members of Congress but of the sentiments of the people we have the honor to represent.

If these were normal times, I would call your attention to the fact that this bill, H. R. 1605, has all the earmarks of a log-rolling or pork-barrel piece of legislation in that it affects three different groups. These are not normal times and this legislation must be approached from the viewpoint as to the contribution its provisions must make in helping to win the war.

Section 2, whereby the excess, or penalty, wheat is allowed to be fed by its producers to their own livestock. This section was passed by the House as a bill in the Seventy-seventh Congress but did not become a law. You will note that the farmers who have already paid their penalty are not to be reimbursed but the ones who have not paid the penalty will be relieved of the responsibility of doing so. Since the penalty was changed from 15 to 49 cents a bushel after the wheat crop had already been planted and since the wheat involved is only 25,000,000 or 30,000,000 bushels—which will be converted into poultry, eggs, and other livestock products, to win the war—this section should have little opposition. It should be noted here and now that the same wheat leadership here in the House that put the increase and penalty on the statutes are now asking its repeal, which should teach us to look a little ahead as to the effects of the legislation we pass. It might also be called to your attention that it is regrettable that any legislation has to be tacked onto some measure that has enough majority approval to get it enacted into law.

We now come to section 3 in regard to corn payments and loans. This problem has been under discussion for at least 5 years. This section should determine whether the control on controls are to be eliminated for the duration as far as corn is concerned.

PEANUTS

When the last piece of peanut legislation was enacted into law, I concluded that from then on, it would be very desirable to at least have the Members know what agricultural legislation was being passed. This previous peanut legislation was tacked onto a Senate bill, agreed to by the conference committee, became a part of the law of the land upon agreement of the conference committee. It was never even discussed on the floor of the House. I asked for a couple of minutes when the conference committee reported to the House. I was advised that no discussions were to be allowed and none were allowed.

We are now to section 4, the far-reaching part of this present proposed legislation. Hearings were never held on this section of the bill. Growers of peanuts did not express their wishes to the committee. The men in the peanut business did not express their views and the manufacturers of peanut products did not appear before our committee to give their approval or disapproval of this section. No one submitted any evidence to show that an increase in production is any more needed than the increase in other fats and oils are needed. The peanuts produced in 1942 were one-third less than the 1942 peanut goal and the soybeans produced in 1942, in terms of pounds, was one-third greater than the goal of 1943. On the face of it, one would conclude that if soybean oil equals peanut oil, it should be much easier to increase vegetable oil by increasing the soybean acreage. There was estimated by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the United States Department of Agriculture to be seven times the amount of soybean oil produced in 1942 as there was peanut oil in 1942.

According to the United States Department of Agriculture, the production of peanuts in the United States in 1941 showed Georgia producing 37 percent, North Carolina 12 percent, Alabama 18 percent, Florida 10 percent, Texas 8 percent, Virginia 7 percent, and Oklahoma 2 percent, and Louisiana, Arkansas, Mississippi, Tennessee, and South Carolina, together, producing less than 1 percent each.

The forerunner of H. R. 1605 was H. R. 1561. Section 4 of this H. R. 1561, page 4, line 20, is stated as follows:

> All peanuts produced in the calendar years 1943 and 1944 may be marketed by producers through agencies designated by the Secretary of Agriculture or to other producers for seed without the payment of penalty; the marketing of any peanuts produced in such years in any other manner or through any other person shall be subject to a penalty of 3 cents per pound.

We have heard considerable about men having to join a union to secure work to win the war but did not you know that a farmer might have to pay a penalty of 3 cents a pound to furnish the food to win the war? One of our colleagues questioned the wisdom of this paragraph and now we find in H. R. 1605:

> All peanuts produced in the calendar years 1943 and 1944 may be marketed by producers through agencies designated by the Secretary of Agriculture or to other producers for seed without the payment of penalty.

Please note the language "may be marketed." It will be reassuring to these peanut producers that they may market their peanuts through agencies designated by the Secretary of Agriculture. Is not this language rather indefinite in the light of our past experience with bureaucratic interpretations?

This legislation, if passed, would no doubt be followed by other products with more than one ceiling price. For example, take milk—with a 46-cent ceiling for butter, the milk would be around $1.90 per hundredweight. For cheese, it would be $2.45 per hundredweight and for condensed milk around $2.65 per hundredweight, and for city milk from $3 to $4 per hundredweight. Since fluid milk is usually about one-third of the national production, would not the other two-thirds of the industry expect to obtain the ceiling price of the O. P. A. of the city fluid milk, and would they not be equally entitled to the same consideration?

According to the January 29, 1943, Agricultural Prices issued by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, United States Department of Agriculture, the parity price for peanuts for edible purposes was 7.58 cents per pound, or $151.60 a ton. The comparable parity price for peanuts used for oil was 3.71 cents per pound, or $74.20 a ton. This was computed under Section 3B of the Price Control Act. In fairness, I think this comparable price may be subject to considerable criticism and most justly so. The farmer on January 15, 1943, received $3.97 per hundredweight, or $79.40 a ton, although on January 15, 1942, he had received the full $80 per ton. The price for peanuts for edible purposes was $5.94 per hundredweight, or $118.80 a ton, and on January 15, 1943, the farmer received $6.23 per hundredweight, or $124.60 a ton.

This bill has nothing to do with the incentive payments of $30 per acre for peanuts, $15 per acre for soybeans, and $10 per acre for flax. You might note that incentive payments of $30 per acre for the average acre of peanuts would be 678 pounds times 29 percent fat, or 196 pounds per acre; would make incentive payments $30 divided by 196 pounds—would make the incentive payment 15 cents per pound or more than the selling price or the 13 cents per pound as set by the O. P. A. This, of course, would apply only to the extra acres above the allotted acres.

No one can give an approximate amount that this bill will cost. The subsidy is dependent upon whether the price set will be 85 percent or full parity of 100 percent. You will note the bill states, on page 5, line 4:

> At not less than 85 percent of the parity price for peanuts as of July 15 of the year in which such peanuts were produced.

If we produce the goal of 1943 we would produce 3,712,000,000 pounds, or 1,856,000 tons. If they were all sold for oil, which they, of course, will not be, on the basis of $80 a ton and after paying $130 for them, we could expend $50 times 1,856,000 tons, or $92,800,000. The amount retained by the producer for seed and the amount of profit from peanuts sold for edible purposes, of course, would be deducted from this amount. What this amount really will be is difficult to ascertain. There is also the possibility $150 per ton might be paid instead of $130 in which case the cost, of course, would be increasingly more.

WHAT ARE THE FACTS?

The production of fats and oils for 1942 was—

| | Pounds |
|---|---|
| Vegetable oils: | |
| 1. Cottonseed products | 1,445,000,000 |
| 2. Soybean oil | 1,440,000,000 |
| 3. Linseed oil | 730,000,000 |
| 4. Corn oil | 248,000,000 |
| 5. Peanut oil | 200,000,000 |
| Total vegetable oils produced in 1942 | 4,063,000,000 |
| Animal fats: | |
| 1. Lard | 2,500,000,000 |
| 2. Beef and mutton fats, edible | 300,000,000 |
| Total animal fats produced in 1942 | 2,800,000,000 |
| Total vegetable oils and animal fats produced in 1942 | 6,863,000,000 |

We then have the peanut oil in 1942, representing less than 5 percent of the total vegetable oil in the United States and less than 3 percent of the oils and fats of the Nation. No recent discovery has been made—at least not called to the committee's attention—showing that peanut oil was any more of a war necessity than any of these vegetable oils. We no doubt are losing more lard, which is being sold along with our meats at 30 and 45 cents per pound and also being lost due to the fact that these hog products are not being marketed through the normal channels of trade, than we will produce by passing this bill.

I have made every effort to keep from discussing this legislation from a sectional or partisan standpoint. I do, however, think that the membership is entitled to the facts. As I said before, these facts were never presented to the committee.

In conclusion, then, the section 4 should be eliminated from this bill because, first, there has never been any testimony before the committee to show the importance of additional subsidy to peanut oil over other vegetable oils; second, because the industry and growers have never been heard by the committee; third, the subsidy together with the contemplated incentive payments would be out of line with other vegetable oil crops; fourth, we most assuredly should not be legislating anyone out of the peanut business or any other business without the courtesy of a hearing. If we do we surely cannot support our colleague, the Honorable WRIGHT PATMAN, and the good work that he is doing with his Small Business Committee; sixth, there is not any sense to passing legislation and turning these crops over to the so-called bureaucrats and then turning around and spending hour after hour on the floor of the House criticizing the bureaucrats for doing the things we ask in the legislation that we pass ourselves right here on the floor of the House.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

THE FLOWERING OF BUREAUCRACY IN AMERICA

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, the other day in presenting the Treasury and Post Office Departments' appropriation bill to the House, I referred to the flowering of bureaucracy in the United States.

Today I ask your indulgence while I present some illuminating facts and figures showing how bureaucracy has really flowered in our country.

As a background for the figures which I shall present, showing the mushroom growth of bureaucracy, I call attention to the fact that, generally speaking, there is no difference between a public law and an Executive order, except that laws are enacted by Congress in the manner prescribed by the Constitution when it created the legislative body, while Executive orders, as their name indicates, are orders originating in the executive establishment of government, which the founders of our country intended should execute, but should not make the laws.

Executive orders usually have their genesis in the bureaus and are expressions of bureaucratic minds. When promulgated they have the force and effect of law. Those who originate them are not elected by the people. They do not represent anybody. They stand for their own peculiar ideas and hobbies and do not speak for any well-established philosophy or any political party. They are intent, as a rule, on promoting their own notions and enhancing their bureaucratic power and authority. Many of them are theorists who think they know how to remake the world but who overlook the laws of Nature and the immutable principle of sound economics.

The following table shows in one column the number of Executive orders issued each year during the last 10 years and in the other column the corresponding number of public laws enacted by Congress in each year:

| | Executive orders issued | Public laws enacted by Congress |
|---|---|---|
| 1933 | 658 | 93 |
| 1934 | 472 | 446 |
| 1935 | 390 | 482 |
| 1936 | 275 | 505 |
| 1937 | 257 | 494 |
| 1938 | 249 | 425 |
| 1939 | 287 | 454 |
| 1940 | 309 | 551 |
| 1941 | 382 | 397 |
| 1942 | 286 | 453 |
| Total | 3,565 | 4,300 |

These figures show that the bureaus have been about as busy legislating as has been the branch of government that was created and ordained to make the laws of our country. It will be noted that in 1 year, 1933, the number of Executive orders issued was 700 percent more than the number of laws enacted by Congress. In the next year, 1934, the number of Executive orders exceeded by 26 the number of laws enacted by Congress. In 1941 the 397 laws enacted exceeded the number of Executive orders issued by only 15. The figures as to the number of Executive orders issued were furnished to me by the office of the Federal Register.

It is not my purpose to try to fix the blame for the gross usurpation of the legislative function by the bureaucrats. As a matter of fact, I think there is a divided responsibility for this untoward development. I think on the one hand that there has been an excess of zeal on the part of the executive department in grasping for authority, and on the other hand a pusillanimous weakness on the part of Congress in meekly surrendering its powers.

In the early days of the New Deal when the President was displaying rare courage in proposing new and untried expedients to meet critical situations, I frequently heard influential Members of the House say, "If he wants to stick his neck out let him do so; it will keep the heat off of us."

In those days congressional weakness was about in proportion to Presidential daring. Congress neither recognized nor rose to its responsibilities. It was always willing to pass a "hot potato" over to the President and let him handle it. An atmosphere was created in which blanket checks became very popular and bureaucracy flourished like a green bay tree.

Today it is a condition and not a theory that confronts us. Bureaucracy has grown until, with its vast dominion of authority and its ever-increasing yen for more and more power, it is threatening to change the entire form and mold of our Government. It is high time for our people to become aroused and to insist that Congress shall move immediately and decisively to recapture its powers. Otherwise, we may wake up one of these days to find every act of our lives ordered and directed by a great bureaucratic Frankenstein in Washington.

With the knowledge that this bureaucracy does exist; that it is developing into a great menace, and that it does exert a disintegrating and corroding influence on our institutions and our American way of life it is the patriotic duty of all of our leaders in the executive establishment no less than in Congress to pay attention to the danger signals and to cooperate in bringing our Government back to its proper place within the four corners of the Constitution.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago I secured permission to insert in the Appendix of the RECORD two letters from the Department of Agriculture. I ask unanimous consent to include with those letters a summary of price-support programs which accompanied them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. VOORHIS of California]. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE]?

There was no objection.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1943

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou whose Name is above every name, be pleased to hear our supplication. Thou who art the redeemer of the lost and the avenger of the oppressed, grant that our hopefulness may never forsake us and our helpfulness for our fellow men never desert us. We beseech Thee that the valor of heroism may be in our blood like a vein of iron and in our voice like the sound of a trumpet.

Almighty God, we pray that America may be a land in which the grandest note is unity and in which young and old flee from vanity, luxury, and irreverence. Guard us, dear Lord, against a grudging and a contentious spirit that we may prove ourselves to be irreproachable in the midst of a perverse world. We pray that every citizen in public and in private life may make himself altogether worthy of his country, bowing in gratitude and lifting his soul in praise for every loyal heart which beats beneath a soldier's uniform; we are debtors to these guardians of our freedom, whether highly placed or lowly born. Heavenly Father, mercifully be with these martyrs of liberty and with these prophets of brotherhood. Keep us true to our sacred trust and forbid that we should ever fail and Thine shall be the praise through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SHIPBUILDING IN RESPECT TO NAVAL CONSTRUCTION

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Speaker, last fall the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], appointed a special committee to investigate shipbuilding as it pertains to naval construction. That committee was composed of myself and the gentleman from California [Mr. ANDERSON]. We proceeded to the west coast and spent about a month on the job, interviewing scores of witnesses. We were ably assisted up and down the coast by other Representatives of Congress, and I see my colleague the gentleman from California [Mr. ROLPH], who was one of them, and we made an exhaustive study of the shipbuilding industry on the west coast. Yesterday we filed a report with the House Naval Affairs Committee, of which 500 copies are printed, and I hope that the Members of the House will get a copy of it and read that report, because it covers the subject well. It covers the matters of labor, of absenteeism, and relates just how we are progressing in our shipbuilding program.

MR. NELSON AND THE WAR PRODUCTION BOARD

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to express the thankfulness that I have for Mr. Nelson's action of Wednesday. Thank God, somebody in this town has worked up the backbone to fire someone. The W. P. B. has at last established a clear line of authority, and if we do not meet our production schedules we and the country will know where to place the blame.

In my humble opinion Mr. Charles E. Wilson is the best thing that has happened to the W. P. B. since it was established. He makes decisions, production decisions, and makes them stick. He does not run to the White House over every little trifle and keep everybody in an uproar because he cannot or will not make up his mind. He is the kind of American production genius that we need in the W. P. B. If the other war corporations would follow the lead of General Electric and give us their finest production men instead of their sales managers, lawyers, or bankers, we would get the stuff we need to win a whole lot faster.

FOOD SITUATION ON WEST COAST

Mr. ROLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROLPH. Mr. Speaker, the food situation throughout the country is acute, and Mayor Angelo J. Rossi, of San Francisco, has sent me the following telegram:

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., February 18, 1943.
Congressman TOM ROLPH,
Washington, D. C.:

The food situation in San Francisco for the general public is chaotic and discriminatory. It should be recognized that in the last year the population of San Francisco has increased by nearly 100,000 and other cities in the bay area in proportionate amounts. It must be recognized that the basic American diet is dairy products, eggs, meat, bread, potatoes, green vegetables, and fruit. Because of lack of rationing formulas, due to Federal official hesitation, much of these foods have disappeared from the local markets and are impossible to obtain even in limited quantities, and as time goes on they will become scarcer and the average citizen will not be able to obtain them. Have been advised that cities east of the Rockies are not suffering the food shortage that has been visited upon the Pacific coast. Whether this is due to rationing or larger allotments of food I do not know, but I do know that if some relief is not given at once the health of the people of San Francisco and surrounding communities will be impaired and the result will be detrimental to the general war effort. I therefore urge immediate correction of discrimination in food allotment and distribution to San Francisco and bay area. San Francisco like her sister cities intends to dig to live with victory gardens, but victory gardens do not produce meat and other staple foods necessary for the health of their people. It is therefore imperative for you to present this chaotic food situation to the proper authorities, and if necessary to urge the adoption of legislation which will bring relief to the Pacific coast.

ANGELO J. ROSSI, Mayor.

OIL PIPE LINES

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RIVERS. Mr. Speaker, I do this to bring to the attention of the House a condition which I do not believe Members know exists at this time. Last August, when we were considering the Florida barge canal bill, we passed as an amendment to that bill a provision for the construction of a pipe line from the Tinsley field in Mississippi to Charleston, S. C., and/or Savannah, Ga., to take care of the armed services. Since that time we have been unable to get any consideration from the Interior Department, under whose jurisdiction the construction of these lines comes. This bill passed the House without a dissenting vote and also passed the Senate. It was sent to the President and signed by him, and now the Secretary of the Interior says he does not think we need the line. Whose judgment is better, that of the Senate and the House of Representatives and of the President or one man in the Interior Department?

Let me give you some figures:

Seventy thousand barrels of oil a day, or 3,000 tank cars a day, will be released. One million and ninety-five thousand tank cars a year will be released from that field alone for the benefit of the frozen people of the east coast.

Who is going to run this Government, the bureaucrats or the Congress?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein a certified copy of a resolution passed by the Missouri State Senate on February 16, 1943, calling to the attention of the Members of Congress the fact that there has been no war industry allotted to the northern half of Missouri by our Government.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therewith an address delivered by a former member of this body, Hon. John J. Dempsey, now Governor of New Mexico.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

APPLAUSE AND OTHER DEMONSTRATIONS IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday Mme. Chiang Kai-shek spoke in both the House and the Senate. Unfortunately an order was issued by the Speaker some time ago forbidding the reporters to report demonstrations on the floor of the House, with the result that while this lady received one of the greatest demonstrations here ever given anyone in all the history of this country, and while the RECORD shows round after round of applause in the Senate and a standing demonstration at the close of her address, the RECORD would indicate that we sat here like a bunch of mummies. No applause, no demonstrations whatsoever were recorded.

I submit this is a question for the House, as to whether or not these demonstrations should be excluded. They have not been excluded in the Senate. They have never been excluded in the British House of Parliament. It is a question for the individual Member to strike out, if he desires to do so, whatever demonstrations are indicated by the transcripts of the official reporters when his speech is taken down.

If that policy had been followed—that time-honored policy that began with the Government and only ended something like a year ago—America would be reading in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD today the speech by Mme. Chiang Kai-shek in her appeal for the Chinese people who are being brutally destroyed by the savage Japanese, showing the greatest demonstration she has ever received in her life, and one of the greatest ever given anyone in this House.

I am introducing a resolution to restore to the Congress the right to have those demonstrations recorded.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

JAPANESE IN THE UNITED STATES ARMED FORCES

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, on matters of a purely military nature I like to agree with the War Department officials when possible to do so. But the question of taking Japanese into the United States Army is not purely a military question, and I regret to say that I have my doubts about the wisdom of that action. Our experience with the Japanese during this war has been such as to create in the minds of many of us grave doubt that we should permit any of them to get into our armed services. That they can be of service to our country no one will question, but the people of that nation have shown themselves to be so depraved and so utterly lacking in the elements of human decency that I am not certain that we can trust them in our armed forces. When we place them in the Army they occupy a position where they can be of greatest harm to our Nation, and, incidentally, of greatest service to their own if they choose to pursue that course. It will be argued that since those taken into the Army are American-born Japanese, they do not share the same concept as the older and native-born Japanese. But I doubt that the perfidy, the treachery, and the complete lack of elementary human principles which have been instilled into a people for centuries can be removed with one generation. I think the risk is too great to take. The few thousand taken in could not hope to contribute a great deal to the effectiveness of our fighting forces, but a few dozen in that group might do irreparable harm. Mr. Speaker, I am not here condemning the War Department for its action in this matter, but I am so skeptical of the Japanese that I regret that the War Department has consented to take this step, and I hope, at least, that it will proceed with the greatest caution.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I received permission to insert in the RECORD a very able address by the Honorable Leland Olds, Chairman of the Federal Power Commission. The Government Printing Office informs me it would cover three pages instead of the two pages allowed and that the cost of those three pages altogether would be $135. I could cut this speech in two and put in a portion of it under the permission granted me on yesterday, but it is a very able address, and I would like to have the entire speech go in. So I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD as requested.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include a recent address by Rabbi Charles E. Shulman, who is now chaplain in the service of the armed forces of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RODGERS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include therein a petition with reference to rent control.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourn today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can the gentleman tell me what the program will be for next week?

Mr. McCORMACK. I cannot at this time; I will later in the day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

THE DIES COMMITTEE

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Speaker, I have heard many Members during my 8 years here come in on what is called an automatic roll-call vote and say afterward they misunderstood the question. Yesterday I did that for my first time.

I have voted each time for the extension of the Dies committee; I have voted each time for the appropriation, and when I came in the question was under discussion, and all the debate I heard was as to whether or not an item for some $600 for defending a lawsuit should be included in the appropriation. I think it should not have been; I would have voted to cut it out. But when I read the RECORD it was the whole appropriation of $75,000 on which I was recorded as voting "no," which, of course, is very inconsistent and unreasonable, for I am on record as voting to extend this committee. This explanation is the only way to correct it. I thought I was voting to eliminate the lawsuit item instead of voting against the appropriation. I just wanted this to go in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

CONSTRUCTION OF CERTAIN WORKS

Mr. DELANEY, by direction of the Committee on Rules, reported the following resolution (H. Res. 123), which was read and referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

"'(2) Any proposed consolidation or merger of domestic telegraph carriers shall provide for the divestment of the international telegraph operations theretofore carried on by any party to the consolidation or merger, within a reasonable time to be fixed by the Commission, after the consideration for the property to be divested is found by the Commission to be commensurate with its value, and as soon as the legal obligations, if any, of the carrier to be so divested will permit. The Commission shall require at the time of the approval of such consolidation or merger that any such party exercise due diligence in bringing about such divestment as promptly as it reasonably can.

"'(d) No proposed consolidation or merger of telegraph carriers pursuant to this section shall be approved by the Commission if, as a result of such consolidation or merger, more than one-fifth of the capital stock of any carrier which is subject to the jurisdiction of the Commission will be owned or controlled, or voted, directly or indirectly, (1) by any alien or the representative of any alien, (2) by any foreign government or the representative thereof, (3) by any corporation organized under the laws of any foreign government, or (4) by any corporation of which any officer or director is an alien, or of which more than one-fifth of the capital stock is owned or controlled, or voted, directly or indirectly, by any alien or the representative of any alien, by any foreign government or the representative thereof, or by any corporation organized under the laws of a foreign government.

"'(2) If any employee of any carrier which is a party to any such consolidation or merger, who was employed by such carrier immediately preceding the approval of such consolidation or merger, and whose period of employment began after March 1, 1941, is discharged as a consequence of such consolidation or merger by the carrier resulting therefrom, within four years from the date of approval of the consolidation or merger, such carrier shall pay such employee at the time he is discharged severance pay in cash equal to the amount of salary or compensation he would have received during the full four-week period immediately preceding such discharge at the rate of compensation or salary payable to him during such period, multiplied by the number of years he has been continuously employed immediately preceding such discharge by one or another of such carriers who were parties to such consolidation or merger, but in no case shall any such employee receive less severance pay than the amount of salary or compensation he would have received at such rate if he were employed during such full four-week period: Provided, however, That such severance pay shall not be required to be paid to any employee who is discharged after the expiration of a period, following the date of approval of the consolidation or merger, equal to the aggregate period during which such employee was in the employ, prior to such date of approval, of one or more of the carriers which are parties to the consolidation or merger.

"'(4) If any employee is transferred from one community to another, as a result of any such consolidation or merger, the carrier resulting therefrom shall pay, in addition to such employee's regular compensation as an employee of such carrier, the actual traveling expenses of such employee and his family, including the cost of packing, crating, drayage, and transportation of household goods and personal effects.

For purposes of determining and according the rights and benefits specified in this paragraph, any period spent in the employ of the carrier of which such individual was an employee at the time of the consolidation or merger shall be considered to have been spent in the employ of the consolidated or merged carrier. The application for approval of any consolidation or merger under this section shall contain a guaranty by the proposed consolidated carrier that there will be no impairment of any of the rights or benefits specified in this paragraph.

"'(6) Any employee who, since August 27, 1940, has left a position, other than a temporary position, in the employ of any carrier which is a party to any such consolidation or merger, for the purpose of entering the military or naval forces of the United States, shall be considered to have been in the employ of such carrier during the time he is a member of such forces, and, upon making an application for employment with the consolidated or merged carrier within 40 days from the time he is relieved from service in any of such forces under honorable conditions, such former employee shall be employed by the consolidated or merged carrier and entitled to the benefits to which he would have been entitled if he had been employed by one of such carriers during all of such period of service with such forces; except that this paragraph shall not require the consolidated or merged carrier, in the case of any such individual, to pay compensation, or to accord health, disability, or death insurance benefits, for the period during which he was a member of such forces. If any such former employee is disabled and because of such disability is no longer qualified to perform the duties of his former position but otherwise meets the requirements for employment, he shall be given such available employment at an appropriate rate of compensation as he is able to perform and to which his service credit shall entitle him.

"'(7) No employee of any carrier which is a party to any such consolidation or merger shall, without his consent, have his compensation reduced, or (except as provided in paragraph (2) and paragraph (8) of this subsection) be discharged or furloughed during the four-year period after the date of the approval of such consolidation or merger. No such employee shall, without his consent, have his compensation reduced, or be discharged or furloughed, in contemplation of such consolidation and merger, during the six-month period immediately preceding such approval.

"'(8) Nothing contained in this subsection shall be construed to prevent the discharge of any employee for insubordination, incompetency, or any other similar cause.

"'(9) All employees of any carrier resulting from any such consolidation or merger, with respect to their hours of employment, shall retain the rights provided by any collective bargaining agreement in force and effect upon the date of approval of such consolidation or merger until such agreement is terminated, executed, or superseded. Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, any agreement not prohibited by law pertaining to the protection of employees may hereafter be entered into by such consolidated or merged carrier and the duly authorized representative or representatives of its employees selected according to existing law.

"'(10) For purposes of enforcement or protection of rights, privileges, and immunities granted or guaranteed under this subsection, the employees of any such consolidated or merged carrier shall be entitled to the same remedies as are provided by the National Labor Relations Act in the case of employees covered by that Act; and the National Labor Relations Board and the courts of the United States (including the courts of the District of Columbia) shall have jurisdiction and power to enforce and protect such rights, privileges, and immunities in the same manner as in the case of enforcement of the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act.

"'(11) Nothing contained in this subsection shall apply to any employee of any carrier which is a party to any such consolidation or merger whose compensation is at the rate of more than $5,000 per annum.

"'(12) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraphs (1) and (7), the protection afforded therein for the period of four years from the date of approval of the consolidation or merger shall not, in the case of any particular employee, continue for a longer period, following such date of approval, than the aggregate period during which such employee was in the employ, prior to such date of approval, of one or more of the carriers which are parties to the consolidation or merger. As used in paragraphs (1), (2), and (7), the term "compensation" shall not include compensation attributable to overtime not guaranteed by collective bargaining agreements.'

"SEC. 2. Section 214 (a) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 214. (a) No carrier shall undertake the construction of a new line or of an extension of any line, or shall acquire or operate any line, or extension thereof, or shall engage in transmission over or by means of such additional or extended line, unless and until there shall first have been obtained from the Commission a certificate that the present or future public convenience and necessity require or will require the construction, or operation, or construction and operation, of such additional or extended line: Provided, That no such certificate shall be required under this section for the construction, acquisition, or operation of (1) a line within a single State unless such line constitutes part of an interstate line, (2) local, branch, or terminal lines not exceeding ten miles in length, or (3) any line acquired under section 221 or 222 of this Act: Provided further, That the Commission may, upon appropriate request being made, authorize temporary or emergency service, or the supplementing of existing facilities, without regard to the provisions of this section. No carrier shall discontinue, reduce, or impair service to a community, or part of a community, unless and until there shall first have been obtained from the Commission a certificate that neither the present nor future public convenience and necessity will be adversely affected thereby; except that the Commission may, upon appropriate request being made, authorize temporary or emergency discontinuance, reduction, or impairment of service, or partial discontinuance, reduction, or impairment of service, without regard to the provisions of this section. As used in this section the term "line" means any chanel of communication established by the use of appropriate equipment, other than a channel of communication established by the interconnection of two or more existing channels: Provided, however, That nothing in this section shall be construed to require a certificate or other authorization from the Commission for any installation, replacement, or other changes in plant, operation, or equipment, other than new construction, which will not impair the adequacy or quality of service provided.'

"SEC. 3. Section 214 (b) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'(b) Upon receipt of an application for any such certificate, the Commission shall cause notice thereof to be given to, and shall cause a copy of such application to be filed with, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Governor of each State in which such line is proposed to be constructed, extended, acquired, or operated, or in which such discontinuance, reduction, or impairment of service is proposed, with the right to those notified to be heard; and the Commission may require such published notice as it shall determine.'

"SEC. 4. Section 214 (c) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'(c) The Commission shall have power to issue such certificate as applied for, or to refuse to issue it, or to issue it for a portion or portions of a line, or extension thereof, or discontinuance, reduction, or impairment of service, described in the application, or for the partial exercise only of such right or privilege, and may attach to the issuance of the certificate such terms and conditions as in its judgment the public convenience and necessity may require. After issuance of such certificate, and not before, the carrier may, without securing approval other than such certificate, comply with the terms and conditions contained in or attached to the issuance of such certificate and proceed with the construction, extension, acquisition, operation, or discontinuance, reduction, or impairment of service covered thereby. Any construction, extension, acquisition, operation, discontinuance, reduction, or impairment of service contrary to the provisions of this section may be enjoined by any court of competent jurisdiction at the suit of the United States, the Commission, the State commission, any State affected, or any party in interest.'

"SEC. 5. Section 214 (d) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'(d) The Commission may, after full opportunity for hearing, in a proceeding upon complaint or upon its own initiative without complaint, authorize or require by order any carrier, party to such proceeding, to provide itself with adequate facilities for the expeditious and efficient performance of its service as a common carrier and to extend its line or to establish a public office; but no such authorization or order shall be made unless the Commission finds, as to such provision of facilities, as to such establishment of public offices, or as to such extension, that it is reasonably required in the interest of public convenience and necessity, or as to such extension or facilities that the expense involved therein will not impair the ability of the carrier to perform its duty to the public. Any carrier which refuses or neglects to comply with any order of the Commission made in pursuance of this paragraph shall forfeit to the United States $100 for each day during which such refusal or neglect continues.'

"SEC. 6. Section 5266 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., 1940 ed., title 47, sec. 3), is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 5266. Telegrams between the several departments of the Government and their officers, relating exclusively to the public business, in their transmission over the lines of any telegraph company to which has been given the right-of-way, timber, or station lands from the public domain, shall have priority over all other business at such rates as the Federal Communications Commission shall annually fix. No part of any appropriation for the several departments of the Government shall be paid to any company which neglects or refuses to transmit such telegrams in accordance with the provisions of this section: Provided, That nothing in this section shall limit the authority of the Federal Communications Commission, under section 201 (b) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, with respect to the classification of communications and the prescribing of different charges for different classes of communications, and such authority of the Federal Communications Commission to fix rates for Government communications may be exercised with respect to any or all communications to which section 201 (b) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, and this section apply: Provided further, That the term "Government" as used in section 201 (b) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, and the term "departments of the Government" as used in this section, shall be held to refer only to the established departments, independent establishments, and agencies in the legislative, executive and judicial branches of the Federal Government.'"

And the House agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 158) to amend the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, to permit consolidations and mergers of domestic telegraph carriers, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The House amendment struck out all of the Senate bill after the enacting clause. The committee of conference recommends that the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, with an amendment which is a substitute for both the Senate bill and the House amendment, and that the House agree to the same.

The differences between the House amendment and the proposed conference substitute are noted in the following statement, except for incidental changes made necessary by reason of agreements reached, and minor clarifying changes:

PROVISIONS OF THE PROPOSED NEW SECTION 222 OF THE COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1934

Definition of "domestic telegraph operations"

In the definition of the term "domestic telegraph operations," contained in the proposed subsection 222 (a) (5) in the conference substitute, there is included a proviso as follows: "Provided, That nothing in this section shall prevent international telegraph carriers from accepting and delivering international telegraph messages in the cities which constitute gateways approved by the Commission as points of entrance into or exit from the continental United States and, under regulations prescribed by the Commission, the incidental transmission or reception of the same over its own or leased lines or circuits within the continental United States."

This proviso is the same as the one contained in the definition in the Senate bill, except that the words "under regulations prescribed by the commission" have been inserted. It was felt desirable to include this proviso, in order clearly to permit carriers to continue the operations referred to, because of the requirement (in subsection (c) (2)) that in case of a consolidation or merger of domestic telegraph companies the plan of consolidation or merger shall provide for the divestment of the international telegraph operations theretofore carried on by any party to the consolidation or merger.

Commission approval of consolidation or merger

Subsection (c) follows the House provision with respect to Commission approval in the case of a proposed consolidation or merger, except that (1) notice of the public hearing thereon is required to be given not only to those persons specified in the House substitute but also to the Attorney General of the United States and to representatives of employees where represented by bargaining representatives known to the Commission, and (2) the conference substitute does not give the Commission authority, as did the House substitute, to make its approval "subject to such terms and conditions, and such modifications, as it shall find to be just and reasonable." There is included, however, a provision from the Senate bill giving the Commission authority to approve an amended proposal for consolidation or merger.

Divestment of international operations

Paragraph (2) of subsection (c) is a provision taken from the Senate bill, and no similar provision was contained in the House bill. It provides that any proposed consolidation or merger of domestic telegraph carriers shall provide for the divestment of the international telegraph operations theretofore carried on by any party to the consolidation or merger, within a reasonable time to be fixed by the Commission, after the consideration for the property to be divested is found by the Commission to be commensurate with its value, and as soon as the legal obligations, if any, of the carrier to be so divested will permit. The Commission must require at the time of the approval of such consolidation or merger that any such party exercise due diligence in bringing about such divestment as promptly as it reasonably can.

Consideration was given to the inclusion of such a provision while the bill was under consideration by the House committee. It was felt that such divestment would be desirable in the public interest, but in view of certain existing long-term contracts it was felt impracticable to require such action to be taken at this time. However, it is believed that the provision included in the conference substitute will provide for the divestment of such operations without working undue hardship on the companies involved.

Distribution of traffic among international and foreign telegraph carriers

The Senate bill and the House substitute contained substantially similar provisions which provided, in case of a consolidation or merger of domestic telegraph companies, for the working out of a formula with respect to the distribution, by the consolidated carrier, of traffic among international telegraph carriers, and a formula with respect to the distribution of traffic among foreign carriers in a contiguous foreign country. The House provisions are included in the conference substitute, in subsection (e) (1) and (2). It will be noted that in each of these provisions it is required that in case it is necessary for the Commission to prescribe a formula, by reason of failure of the carriers to work out a formula which the Commission approves, the Commission's formula is required to be one which will be, so far as is consistent with the public interest, in accordance with the existing contractual rights of the carriers. This will require the Commission, in each case, to give due regard to the contracts under which the carriers were operating, and had rights, prior to the consolidation or merger.

Provisions for protection of employees

For the purpose of protecting the employees who would be affected by a consolidation or merger of domestic telegraph companies, the House amendment provided that the Commission should require a fair and equitable arrangement to protect the interests of such employees, and required that the Commission include terms and conditions providing that during the period of 4 years from the date of approval such consolidation or merger should "not result in such employees being in a worse position with respect to their compensation or character of employment." It was provided, however, that in the case of any particular employee such protection need not continue for a longer period than that during which the employee was, prior to the approval date, in the employment of one or more of the carriers involved.

In lieu of this provision the conference substitute contains three paragraphs, subsection (a) (1), (2), and (7). These paragraphs are based upon provisions of the Senate bill but contain modifications.

Paragraph (1) provides that each employee who entered the employ of any of the companies involved, on or before March 1, 1941, shall continue to be employed by the consolidated or merged carrier for not less than 4 years from the approval date, and provides that during such period no such employee shall, without his consent, have his compensation reduced or be assigned to work which is inconsistent with his past training and experience in the telegraph industry.

Paragraph (2) requires that severance pay shall be paid in the case of any employee who entered employment after March 1, 1941, and who is discharged as a consequence of the consolidation or merger and within 4 years of the date of approval thereof. Such severance pay is to be equal to the amount of salary or compensation the employee would have received during the full 4-week period immediately preceding his discharge, at the rate of compensation or salary payable to him during such period, multiplied by the number of years he has been continuously employed immediately preceding such discharge by one or another of the carriers, but in no case is the employee to receive less severance pay than the amount of salary or compensation he would have received at such rate if he had been employed during such full 4-week period. This paragraph contains a proviso, however, that such severance pay shall not be required to be paid to any employee who is discharged after the expiration of a period, following the date of approval of the consolidation or merger, equal to the aggregate period during which such employee was in the employ, prior to such date of approval, of one or more of the carriers which are parties to the consolidation or merger.

The first sentence of paragraph (7) provides that no employee of any carrier which is a party to a consolidation or merger shall, without his consent, have his compensation reduced, or (except as provided in par. (2) or (8)) be discharged or furloughed during the 4-year period after the date of the approval of the consolidation or merger. Paragraph (7) also provides that no such employee shall, without his consent, have his compensation reduced, or be discharged or furloughed, in contemplation of consolidation or merger, during the 6-month period immediately preceding such approval.

A new paragraph (12), which is based on a provision which was contained in subsection (f) (1) of the House amendment, is included in subsection (f) of the conference substitute. This paragraph provides that notwithstanding the 4-year protection provided for in paragraphs (1) and (7), such protection shall be required to be afforded, in the case of any particular employee, only for a period following the approval of the consolidation or merger equal to the aggregate period during which such employee was employed by one or more of the carriers prior to the approval date. The effect of paragraphs (1), (7), and (12), taken together, is that no employee will be granted protection thereunder for more than 4 years and, in the case of employees who worked for one or more of the companies for an aggregate period of less than 4 years prior to the approval date, the protection would be afforded for such time, less than 4 years, as would correspond to his total period of employment prior to the approval date.

It will be noted that under paragraphs (1) and (7) the compensation of an employee may be reduced with his consent. It is contemplated that authorized collective bargaining agents will have the power to give such consent to reductions in compensation on behalf of employees.

The protection provided in paragraph (1) and in the first sentence of paragraph (7), against reduction of an employee's compensation without his consent, is a protection against reduction of such compensation below the compensation the employee was being paid at the time of or immediately prior to the approval of the consolidation or merger. If an employee's compensation is increased after the approval of the consolidation or merger, these provisions will not require that the employee's consent be obtained before reducing his compensation if such reduction does not result in his compensation being below what it was at the time of or immediately prior to the approval of the consolidation or merger.

Paragraph (12) also includes a definition of the term "compensation," taken from the House amendment, which will be applicable to that term as used in paragraphs (1), (2), and (7).

Paragraph (4) of the House amendment related to the duty of the consolidated or merged carrier to accord pension, health, disability, or death insurance benefits to employees, former employees, or former employees of any carrier which is a party to a consolidation or merger. In the House amendment the words "pension rights" were used. In the conference substitute (par. (5)) the word "rights" has been omitted. The words "under comparable conditions," which were in the House paragraph, have also been omitted. It is not believed that these omissions make any substantive change in the meaning of the provision. It was felt that their retention was unnecessary and would have given rise to difficulties of interpretation.

Subsection (g) of the House amendment

Subsection (g) of the proposed new section-222, in the House amendment, read as follows:

"(g) The authority conferred by this section shall be exclusive and plenary, and any carrier participating in or resulting from any transaction approved by the Commission under this section shall have full power to carry such transaction into effect without securing approval otherwise than as specified in this section."

This subsection has been omitted from the conference substitute. In view of its broadness and its general terms, the conference committee was not entirely clear as to its full scope and effect. It was felt that it might, for example, limit the jurisdiction of the Securities and Exchange Commission under one or more of the several acts which it administers, and that such an effect would have been undesirable.

Amendments to section 214 of the Communications Act of 1934

Both the Senate bill and House amendment rewrote section 214 (a), (b), and (c) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended.

In section 214 (a) as contained in the House amendment, the following provision appeared:

"No carrier shall discontinue service to a community, or part of a community, unless and until there shall first have been obtained from the Commission a certificate that neither the present nor future public convenience and necessity will be adversely affected thereby; except that the Commission may, upon appropriate request being made, authorize temporary or emergency discontinuance of service, or partial discontinuance of service, without regard to the provisions of this section."

The conference substitute retains this provision except that, after the words "No carrier shall discontinue", a comma and the words "reduce, or impair" have been inserted, and necessary amendments have been made to conform to this change.

The amended section 214 (a) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, as included in the conference substitute, contains the proviso which was in the House amendment, eliminating the requirement of a certificate of public convenience and necessity in certain cases in order to avoid imposing on the carriers the necessity for making a burdensome number of applications. The cases in which the requirement is eliminated are those where no new construction is involved (as, for example, the providing of additional circuits by installing carrier or phantom equipment, or the making of other installations, changes, or replacements in plant or equipment), subject, however, to the restriction that a certificate will have to be obtained if the action proposed to be taken by the carrier would impair the adequacy or quality of service provided.

Rates for Government telegrams

Section 6 of the Senate bill amended section 5266 of the Revised Statutes, which was derived from the Post Roads Act of July 24, 1866, as amended, so as to (1) eliminate that part of such section which gives the Federal Communications Commission authority to fix rates for Government telegrams, and (2) provide that no telegraph company should, by reason of any benefit received under the Post Roads Act of July 24, 1866, be required to transmit Government telegrams at rates less than those applicable to other telegrams in the same classes.

In the House amendment, as reported to the House by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, this section of the Senate bill was not changed. The House, however, amended it by striking out the sentence which provided that no telegraph company should by reason of any benefit received under the Post Roads Act of July 24, 1866, be required to transmit such telegrams at rates less than those applicable to other telegrams in these same classes. Since the amendment made by the House did not, however, restore the language of such section 5266 giving the Communications Commission the authority to prescribe rates for Government telegrams, it is doubtful whether the amendment would have had the effect of requiring the continuance of reduced rates for Government telegrams under such section 5266, although this was clearly the purpose of the amendment.

Section 6 of the conference substitute accomplishes the purpose of the House by amending section 5266 so as to retain therein the language authorizing the Communications Commission to prescribe rates for Government telegrams and, in addition, provides that nothing in the section shall limit the authority of the Commission, under section 201 (b) of the Communications Act of 1934, to classify communications and to prescribe different charges of different classes of communications, and provides that such authority of the Commission may be exercised with respect to any or all communications to which section 201 (b) applies and to which section 5266 of the Revised Statutes applies. Under such section 201 (b) the Commission may classify "Government" communications as such, and prescribe rates therefor.

The conference committee was informed that the word "agents" now contained in section 5266 has been interpreted so that cost-plus-a-fixed-fee contractors, having contracts with the Government, are permitted to send telegrams at the reduced Government rate. It was felt that this practice should not continue, and section 5266 has, therefore, been amended by striking out the words "and agents" and by including a definition of "departments of the Government" and "Government," which will be applicable for purposes of section 5266 and section 201 (b) of the Communications Act of 1934, in order to carry out the purpose of denying to such contractors the privilege of sending telegrams at the reduced rates applicable in the case of official Government telegrams.

CLARENCE J. BROWN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, the conferees on the part of the House and the conferees on the part of the Senate came to an agreement on this bill. There are only two major differences between the House bill and the bill as agreed upon by the conferees. One was the amendment placed in the bill on the floor of the House relating to Government messages. We compromised in that regard by agreeing to a new paragraph carrying the provision that Government tolls should still be under the supervision and regulation of the Federal Communications Commission, but we defined the meaning of the word "Government"—that is, that it should refer only to messages sent by the established departments and independent establishments of the executive branch and the agencies in the legislative and judicial branches of the Federal Government. At present contractors furnishing supplies to the Government under the cost-plus system are sending messages which are being carried as Government messages and thus charged the Government rate. The language finally agreed upon eliminates that practice. That is the one great change. There were also changes in some of the labor provisions.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I believe it was not called to the attention of the House at the time the bill was under consideration that a number of the large companies of the country, such as General Motors, Ford, Chrysler, and others, were receiving the same discount on telegrams as has been extended to the Government—to wit, 40 percent on all their telegrams—simply because they were considered to be agents of the Government under the provisions of the original act. This amendment leaves the rates for the Government itself just where they have been all the time, but it strikes out the privilege that has been extended to companies, such as those referred to, of obtaining Government rates.

Mr. CASE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE. In addition to the explanation the gentleman has given, do I correctly understand that the conference report restores to the bill certain language known as section 5266, so as to make a positive affirmation of the protection of the Government?

Mr. BULWINKLE. The gentleman is correct. But I should also say that the Federal Communications Commission should review this question of Government rates to do justice.

The other provision is in regard to labor. We accepted the provisions of the Senate bill providing for severance pay for the employees who entered into employment after March 1, 1941, allowing 4 weeks for each year of service. There were also other amendments agreed to which are fully set out in the statement of the managers on the part of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT OF THE AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ACT OF 1938

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1605) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, with respect to farm-acreage allotments, the farm marketing excess of wheat, the use of excess corn as silage for feed to livestock on the farm, to provide for the adequate supply of peanuts for oil and other uses, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 1605, with Mr. MAGNUSON in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER] has 35 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] has 15 minutes remaining.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. PLUMLEY].

SUBVERSIVE SUBSIDIES NO INCENTIVE TO PATRIOTS

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago I put into the RECORD a statement containing messages which I had received from the Honorable E. H. Jones, Commissioner of Agriculture for the State of Vermont, the Honorable Henry A. Stoddard, master of the Vermont State Grange, and the Honorable Arthur Packard, president of the Farm Bureau of Vermont, in which these gentlemen expressed their views concerning subsidy payments for farmers—see page A453 in the Appendix of the RECORD.

Subsequent to the receipt of the abovementioned letters from my own constituents, I asked the following question of Albert S. Goss, master of the National Grange; of W. R. Ogg, director of research for the American Farm Bureau Federation, and of Ezra T. Benson, executive secretary of the National Council of Farmer Cooperatives:

> Will you briefly state to me at your earliest convenience the reasons why the organization which you represent is opposed to Mr. Wickard's request for $100,000,000 to subsidize the American farmer?

I call your attention to the replies which I have received. Master Albert S. Goss of the Grange wrote me as follows:

> THE NATIONAL GRANGE,
> Washington, D. C., February 15, 1943.
> Hon. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY,
> House Office Building, Washington, D. C.
> DEAR MR. PLUMLEY: Answering your letter of February 13, we are opposed to the use of an additional $100,000,000 for incentive payments as proposed by the Department of Agriculture unless adequate safeguards can be thrown around the appropriation to prevent its use as subsidies and to assure that it would be used in the form of an incentive for production which would otherwise be uneconomic. We believe that the best and most effective incentive for increasing production is a price which will make it possible to produce in maximum volume. We are opposed to any form of subsidies which are used in lieu of a fair price. Briefly our reasons are as follows:
> First, in the Price Control Act of October 1942 Congress set up certain principles for stabilizing prices and expressly provided against any form of price fixing which would retard production when it adopted the following limitations: "Provided, That modification shall be made in maximum prices established for any agricultural commodity * * * in any case where it appears that such modification is necessary to increase the production of such commodities for war purposes." The original bill had no such proviso. It was added after I pointed out to the Banking and Currency Committee the dangers in the following language:

"Subsidies are not mentioned in the President's message. Subsidies are not mentioned in the bill, but all the powers are there for their use if the President so decides. Congress should not pass by such a vital issue without an understanding on it. We believe Congress should set forth the policy of meeting the costs of war dislocation now by assuring enough flexibility in ceilings to meet these unavoidable costs. We recommend that this principle be written into the measure itself by adding the following words after the word 'President' in the second sentence: 'Shall adjust prices where necessary to maintain adequate production goals.'"

The purpose seems entirely clear. Instead of modifying ceilings, however, the administration now proposes using "incentive payments" to increase production. We believe that when a commodity is controlled by a ceiling so that the law of supply and demand will not operate, and a payment is added in any form to increase production, that payment becomes a subsidy, and we are strongly opposed to the use of any form of subsidy in lieu of a price which will enable farmers to produce to the maximum. We are not asking a general price increase. We are merely asking that no ceilings be established at a price so low that farmers cannot produce to the maximum. We believe in letting economic law regulate the price rather than relying on subsidies in lieu of a fair price, and we are opposed to subsidies for the following reasons:

1. As proposed, they would be subsidizing the consumers and the farmers would get the blame.
2. Subsidies are inflationary.
3. Subsidies conceal costs and defeat efforts to correct leaks.
4. Subsidies promote inefficiency.
5. Subsidies make everyone pay for benefits enjoyed by a few.
6. Once used, subsidies are hard to get rid of. If we employ them now during a period of unprecedented income, and prices are thereby held at noncompensatory levels, when the war ends our price structure will be below normal. Then, when it becomes necessary to drop subsidies because of excessive debt, it will either be necessary for farmers to raise prices or go bankrupt. With unemployment a growing problem at that time, it would be impossible to raise prices so the alternative would be bankruptcy. Of all times in American history there is less excuse today for maintaining a false price level to subsidize the consumer than ever before.
7. Subsidies destroy initiative and undermine character. They are not the means of building an independent, self-reliant people.
8. Subsidies are an expedient way of dodging a hard, disagreeable issue. They are the means of evading a fundamental correction to an unbalanced economy.
9. Subsidies open the way to political abuse.
10. Subsidies are the means of building a strong centralized government and lead to dictatorship.

A recent decision of the Supreme Court illustrates our point. An Ohio farmer refused to pay his overproduction fine, arguing that the law had been passed after his crop was planted and he was denied the protection of the fifth amendment to the Constitution, which prohibits taking property without due process of law. Pointing out that wheat prices were being maintained by subsidies, the Court said, "It is hardly lack of due process for the Government to regulate that which it subsidizes."

Of course, it is true that the Government will always regulate that which it subsidizes.

The remedy is to recognize and adjust the uneconomic balance in income which has been artificially stimulated and maintained. Congress should do nothing further toward maintaining this unbalanced economy. It should insist on fundamental reforms rather than relying on the unsound expedient of subsidies.

I think the time has come for plain speaking. The Secretary of Agriculture is in a very difficult position. Congress has ordered that price ceilings shall be modified to secure production. The Office of Price Administration has refused to obey Congress. The President has placed the responsibility of production on the Secretary. The Office of Price Administration refuses to permit him to obey the law and the only thing he can do to assure production is to ask for subsidies.

He put Congress in a very difficult position. You have to choose between allowing the Office of Price Administration to ignore the law or calling a halt. If you call a halt and refuse to grant money for incentive payments you may be blamed for loss of production. Your problem is more difficult because it will take time to make the Office of Price Administration obey the law and the time lost may result in curtailed plantings and curtailed crops, so you hesitate to make an issue of it when vital production is at stake.

It seems to me you have a number of things to consider. First, it should not be forgotten that our chief problems are manpower, machinery, and adequate prices. Solving our manpower situation will do a great deal more toward increasing production than so-called incentive payments. In fact, the incentive payments will probably add very little if we can get the manpower situation corrected. In my judgment these payments are proposed in lieu of a program of adjusting the manpower situation and certainly if they result in any such ends they cannot be justified.

As proposed the payments are apt to prove discriminatory in effect. For example, let us take two farmers, one of whom has produced to the limit of his human and acreage capacity, while the other has made no extended effort. Let us assume a price ceiling which barely pays production costs or even falls a little below production costs. Incentive payments are granted to increase production and the payments are such that they would be very profitable upon the increased production. The man who has already done his best can make no increase and gets no incentive payments while the one who had not previously tried reaps the benefits.

It seems to us that the remedy lies in placing upon the shoulders of the Secretary the responsibility of determining what price is necessary to secure production. At the present time there is a conflict between two agencies of the Government. One is charged with the responsibility of holding down prices, and the other with the responsibility of securing adequate production. It seems apparent that adequate production is the best means of holding down prices, and that the divided responsibility should be terminated. The responsibility of securing adequate production should carry with it the power of determining prices necessary to accomplish that end.

The policy of Congress as expressed in the Price Control Act of October 1942 in requiring modification of maximum prices could be assured if there were included in an appropriation act a proviso that no money should be used to pay subsidies, bonuses, incentive payments, or other similar rewards in the case of any commodity upon which a maximum price had been fixed as long as such maximum limitation existed.

If such safeguards are adopted we believe that the situation would rapidly clear up. Then, if the Secretary were given powers to prevent destructive price ceilings, a limited amount for such incentive payments might be justified. To accomplish the last purpose, we suggest consideration of a proviso that (1) the Secretary of Agriculture should make the determination as to whether modification is necessary in maximum prices on any agricultural commodity or on any processed agricultural commodity or on any commodity made in whole or substantial part therefrom in order to secure increased production for war purposes; (2) in making such determination he should not consider as part of the farmer's income any subsidies, bonuses, incentive payments, or similar rewards received by the farmer; and (3) he should have the power and it should be his duty to set aside any maximum prices so established as to retard production.

Yours sincerely,

A. S. Goss,
Master, the National Grange.

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Ogg, of the American Farm Bureau Federation, sent me the following reply:

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
Washington, D. C., February 16, 1943.

Hon. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN PLUMLEY: In reply to your letter inquiring the reasons why the American Farm Bureau Federation is opposed to the proposed appropriation of $100,000,000 for incentive payments to farmers, I wish to advise that we are opposed to this appropriation for the following reasons:

1. We are opposed to the use of subsidies to consumers in lieu of fair prices to farmers. The proposed incentive payments are in reality subsidies to the consuming public which are offered to farmers in order to avoid paying higher prices to farmers.

If there ever was a time when the American people were able to pay fair prices for farm commodities, they can do so now. The national income is now approximately $120,000,000,000 annually—the highest on record. Nonfarm families today are only paying 22 percent of their total earnings for food—the smallest percentage in 30 years. Thus, despite the increases in the prices of food, the average nonfarm family, because of increased earnings, is spending a smaller percentage of its income for food than ever before.

An economy which does not pay the cost of its food supply is bound to break down sooner or later. Why should consumers be subsidized out of the Treasury at this time, when they are well able to pay fair prices for food without subsidies and when we need to conserve our financial resources for the winning of the war and to avoid adding unduly to our debt burden. There is now pending before Congress a bill to extend the national debt limit to over $200,000,000,000 and some economists are predicting an ultimate national debt of $300,000,000,000. If the Nation embarks upon the policy of holding down inflation by subsidizing consumers out of the Treasury and with inadequate control of wages, which are the principal factor in the costs of all goods and services, there is no telling to what staggering totals such subsidies may eventually mount.

2. Farmers want fair prices in the market place instead of subsidies. The position of the American Farm Bureau Federation on this issue is clearly set forth in Resolution No. 7 entitled "Inflation, Price Control, Subsidies," which was adopted at the last annual meeting of the federation in Chicago, December 8, 9, and 10, 1942, from which I quote the following statement:

"The use of payments to bring farm returns up to parity at a time when huge surpluses were depressing the markets, was entirely justified, but the entire farm program was based on the assumption that parity prices are fair to consumers as well as to farmers, and that as economic conditions improve, market prices would rise to parity, thus eliminating the need for parity payments. Now, with wages higher in relation to food costs than ever before, there is no sound reason why retail prices should not be permitted to rise to such levels as to assure farmers parity for their products in the market place.

"The practice of paying subsidies to avoid raising the price to the consumer cannot be fairly considered as preventing inflation, because the same total amount is paid whether the consumer pays it all, or whether he pays part of it and the taxpayer the balance. We are unalterably opposed to the use of subsidies in lieu of fair prices in the market place at times when consumers are fully able to pay fair prices. We aggressively urge that present experiments in this field be abandoned and be replaced by action based on the more realistic policy of fixing retail price ceilings at levels which will reflect fair prices to the producers of farm products."

No organization has fought harder for parity payments and conservation payments to farmers than the American Farm Bureau Federation, but we asked for these payments because it was not possible to secure parity prices in the market place. In the case of these crops, however, on which incentive payments are to be made, they are commodities on which we have or will have acute shortages. When you have a shortage of a commodity there is no difficulty therefore involved in raising the price. There is no reason why through proper adjustment of the support prices and price ceilings farmers could not obtain sufficient prices to induce them to plant these crops without subsidies.

The fact is, the best incentive for production is price. If the purpose of these payments is to obtain maximum production the best way to obtain this is through an incentive price rather than an incentive payment.

3. The proposed incentive payment program is unfair to farmers. To hold down prices to consumers through subsidizing the cost of producing food at a time when consumers are well able to afford to pay the entire cost, is unfair to the farmer. Not only will farmers be subjected to criticism of the public because of these subsidies at a time when our debt and tax burdens are mounting very rapidly, but farmers will be placed in a very disadvantageous position in the post-war period as a result of such subsidy program. For 20 years American consumers have been getting food at bargain prices. Throughout most of the 20-year period following the First World War farm prices were relatively lower than industrial prices and industrial wages. Now, when consumers are able to pay fair prices for food, if bargain prices are to be continued by means of subsidies in order to avoid requiring consumers to pay the entire cost of food, then when the period of post-war surpluses returns and consumer buying power declines, and debt burdens are much higher, farmers obviously would be placed at a much greater disadvantage.

I believe that the average consumer is willing to pay the farmer a fair price for his food without subsidy so long as there is no excessive pyramiding of margins and costs between the farmer and the consumer. The average consumer would much rather pay more and be able to get enough to eat than to have bargain prices and be short of food.

4. These incentive payments are unnecessary. Farmers are anxious to produce to capacity but that cannot be done unless they can be assured of a sufficient return to enable them to offset their rapidly rising costs. This assurance can be given by proper use of price supports and proper adjustment of price ceilings as authorized under existing law. The goal of maximum production will be achieved more effectively through a price incentive than through an incentive payment.

5. Congress placed a mandate upon the Office of Price Administration and the Secretary of Agriculture to adjust price ceilings and price supports on agricultural commodities to the extent necessary to achieve the necessary production for the war effort. If these mandates of law are fully carried out there will be no need for the proposed incentive payments. Section 3 of the act of October 2, 1942, specifically provides:

"SEC. 3. No maximum price shall be established or maintained for any agricultural commodity under authority of this act or otherwise below a price which will reflect to producers of agricultural commodities the higher of the following prices, as determined and published by the Secretary of Agriculture:

"(1) The parity price for such commodity (adjusted by the Secretary of Agriculture for grade, location, and seasonal differentials) or, in case a comparable price has been determined for such commodity under and in accordance with the provisions of section 3 (b) of the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, such comparable price (adjusted in the same manner); or

"(2) The highest price received by such producers for such commodity between January 1, 1942, and September 15, 1942 (adjusted by the Secretary of Agriculture for grade, location, and seasonal differentials), or, if the market for such commodity was inactive during the latter half of such period, a price for the commodity determined by the Secretary of Agriculture to be in line with the prices, during such period, of other agricultural commodities produced for the same general use. * * *

"* * * That modifications shall be made in maximum prices established for any agricultural commodity and for commodities processed or manufactured in whole or substantial part from any agricultural commodity, under regulations to be prescribed by the President, in any case where it appears that such modification is necessary to increase the production of such commodity for war purposes, or where by reason of increased labor or other costs to the producers of such agricultural commodity incurred since January 1, 1941, the maximum prices so established will not reflect such increased costs: Provided further, That in the fixing of maximum prices on products resulting from the processing of agricultural commodities, including livestock, a generally fair and equitable margin shall be allowed for such processing: Provided further, That in fixing price maximums for agricultural commodities and for commodities processed or manufactured in whole or substantial part from any agricultural commodity, as provided for by this act, adequate weighting shall be given to farm labor."

Section 9 of that act likewise amends the Steagall Act of July 1, 1941, increasing the minimum price support from 85 to 90 percent of parity on any commodities for which the Secretary of Agriculture asks farmers to increase their production for the war effort. In the case of such war crops the Secretary is empowered to establish price supports at whatever levels above the minimum 90 percent of parity level that he finds necessary in order to achieve maximum production for the war.

There can be no question, therefore, either of the legal authority or the specific mandates which Congress has given to the responsible agencies of government to achieve maximum production. Congress has repeatedly rejected subsidies and has repeatedly declared as its policy that prices should be established on agricultural commodities at such levels as will obtain the maximum output needed for the war.

The time has come when Congress should see to it that the laws which it enacts are fully carried out in spirit and intent as well as the letter of the law. The persistent and continued attempts to evade, circumvent, and even ignore the mandates of Congress and policies of Congress, and to coddle the consumer at the expense of the farmer are not only wrecking the morale of farmers but seriously jeopardize an adequate food supply unless these policies and procedures are corrected speedily.

Since last September the morale of farmers in every section of the country has sunk to a low ebb because of the misleading propaganda attacking farmers, farm organizations, and Congress because of their efforts to face these problems realistically and obtain practicable, workable solutions which will enable farmers to get the maximum food produced.

Farmers do not want inflation and our organization has consistently favored an all-out program to control inflation, but thus far there has been no control of wages comparable to the control of farm prices. Those who complained the loudest against the 110 percent of parity provision and against the proposals to require the inclusion of farm wage costs in fixing price ceilings on agricultural commodities, gave their support to a 15-percent rise in industrial wages above the January 1941 level under the so-called Little Steel formula. They thought it was all right for industrial wages to go up 15 percent although they were already at peak levels in 1941, even higher than the peak of World War No. 1—yet, they thought it was all wrong to even permit farmers to include their increased wage costs in fixing farm price ceilings at a time when farmers' wage costs were spiralling rapidly upward, and they were losing hundreds of thousands of workers due to the unprecedented wage inflation.

More recently another wage boost in some cases amounting to 30-percent increase, has been approved through lengthening the workweek and requiring time and a half to be paid for all overtime above 40 hours per week, yet at the same time farmers are told that farmers must not have an increase in price to offset their rapidly rising wage costs. How will farmers be able to get the three million additional workers which they are going to need on the farms this year to produce this enormous supply of food unless price ceilings are sufficiently adjusted so that they can bid up and pay higher wages?

Again and again the provisions and policies of Congress in the price-control legislation have been flagrantly violated and ignored.

For example, ceiling prices were recently established on corn at considerably less than parity prices to farmers although section 3 of the act of October 2 specifically prohibits fixing a maximum price on any agricultural commodity or product thereof below the parity price for such commodity. Similarly price ceilings have been imposed on flour which do not reflect parity prices to producers of wheat. There is nothing in the act which authorizes the inclusion of subsidy payments in fixing farm-price ceilings. Yet the law is being interpreted to authorize the inclusion of subsidies in fixing ceilings on agricultural commodities.

Farmers, and I believe the American people generally, regard this situation as a very crucial issue as to whether the laws of Congress are going to be carried out as intended by Congress or whether officials are going to be permitted to evade them or circumvent them from being carried out as Congress intended. The future preservation of our constitutional democracy and our democratic form of government depends upon whether Congress which under the Constitution is supposed to make the laws by which the people are to be governed is going to require the administrators of these laws to carry out the spirit and intent of the laws enacted by Congress. As indicative of this widespread conviction on the part of the American people I wish to quote at this point the following resolution adopted by voting delegates at our last annual meeting representing millions of farm people in 44 States and Puerto Rico.

"Preservation of constitutional government

"We reaffirm our faith in the constitutional, representative, democratic form of government as the best for the United States of America. Our Nation is blessed with a magnificent heritage of freedom—freedom of speech, freedom of worship, freedom of enterprise. The American way of life has encouraged and rewarded the qualities of initiative, enterprise, resourcefulness, frugality, hard work, and self-denial, and has made America the land of opportunity in the eyes of the entire world. Under the American system we have attained average standards of living that are unmatched anywhere.

"We realize that during this period of world conflict we must have greater central direction of our war effort, but we view with grave concern the continuing efforts being made, under the guise of the war, to centralize greater authority in the executive branch of government and to permit flagrant abuse of administrative powers.

"Among these alarming trends are: The delegation of excessive and unduly sweeping legislative powers to the executive branch; usurpation of additional powers by Government officials through strained interpretations of the statutes; nullification of congressional enactments and policies by administrative orders and regulations; proposals to confer upon the Executive sweeping authority to suspend acts of Congress; propaganda by subversive groups and others, obviously intended to discredit Congress in the eyes of the people and persuade them to yield to further grants of dictatorial power; enormous blank-check appropriations without sufficient control and accounting to the legislative branch; and almost unlimited authority to transfer bureaus and funds or create entirely new bureaus and clothe them with vast powers.

"We view these efforts to weaken the legislative branch of our Government as a serious threat to democracy and freedom in this country.

"While our armed forces are fighting for democracy on the battle fronts of the world, all freedom-loving citizens must be alert and active to preserve our form of representative, constitutional government."

For these reasons, therefore, we believe the time has come when Congress must take appropriate action to correct various policies which, unless corrected, will discourage rather than encourage maximum food production and which may jeopardize our constitutional form of government with its balance of powers between the legislative, executive, and judicial branches.

Sincerely yours,

W. R. Ogg, Director of Research.

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Benson of the National Council of Farmer Cooperatives has this to say in response to my question:

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF
FARMER COOPERATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 16, 1943.

Congressman CHARLES A. PLUMLEY,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

Re farm subsidies.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN PLUMLEY: Through action of the delegate body of this council, which represents cooperative associations distributed in all of the 48 States with farmer memberships in excess of 2,000,000, distributed in practically every county, we have opposed the use of subsidies in lieu of a fair price in the market place.

Farmers throughout the Nation are opposed to Government payments, particularly at a time when the Government is asking for increased production and when consumers are able and willing to pay for the cost of this food direct without calling upon the Government to further increase the national debt, which has already reached dangerous proportions.

Farmers believe that the Nation can and should pay for its current food bill. They believe that even through subsidies, consumers pay for the food they consume through the payment of taxes to provide the funds for subsidies. The only distinction is that the payment may be in different proportions. Further than this, subsidies have a demoralizing effect by tending to make the beneficiaries more subservient to Government. Subsidies invite political abuse, encourage inefficiency, conceal costs, are difficult to stop once they are started, and tend toward the development of a strongly centralized government. Farmers, who are by nature independent in character, resent any program which tends to destroy initiative and undermine the character of the recipients.

We believe that Congress is in a position to greatly strengthen the morale of farmers, which is now at the lowest ebb in recent years, by taking a firm position in opposition to subsidies in lieu of fair prices which will obtain maximum production of needed food and fiber products.

Sincerey yours,

EZRA T. BENSON,
Executive Secretary.

UNAUTHORIZED DIRECTIVES

Mr. Chairman, I am unalterably opposed to any open or subversive attempt to change the form or manner of our Government. I am opposed to unauthorized directives issuing out of the executive department, for which authority has not been specifically given by Congress. To suggest that the Executive can usurp the prerogatives of the legislative branch is to abort the fundamentals.

There are certain things which cannot be done and which cannot be justified at any time or in any place by anybody.

When Abraham Lincoln undertook to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, the Supreme Court of the United States ruled that he acted in disregard of the Constitution.

Every lawyer in this body and every lawyer in the United States—and everybody ought to be a lawyer for his own protection these days—knows that the Supreme Court said in the famous case known as ex parte Milligan:

The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, in all times and under all circumstances.

No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of the Constitution's provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism—the theory of necessity on which it is based is false.

What I wish to say in conclusion is that the end sought to be attained does not to any extent or in any respect justify the means which the Secretary of Agriculture seeks to employ.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GWYNNE].

Mr. GWYNNE. Mr. Chairman, whatever objections may be made to certain sections of this bill, it is at least a recognition of the fact that there is an immediate necessity for increasing the amount of food that will be produced in this country this year. While this bill may accomplish something along that line, it seems to me the objection to it is that it does not remove the real causes of our present trouble.

I hope everyone has read the joint statement made a short time ago by Edward A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau; Albert Goss, master of the National Grange; and Ezra T. Benson, executive secretary of the National Council of Farm Cooperatives. No one can question the authority of any declaration made by these well-known farm leaders.

Among other things, they point out "That the American farm family stands between a large part of the world and hunger." Certainly, if our armed forces, our allies, and our own population are to be fed, it must be by the effort of our own farmers. We have the resources; we have the soil; we have the skilled workers. All we need is for the Government to adopt a program which will permit the full utilization of our productive capacity.

Most of us agree that this cannot be accomplished simply by offering subsidies for crops badly needed. A fair return for the farmer in the market place is essential.

At the root of the difficulty, of course, is the lack of experienced help. The farmer's sons are being taken into the Army in ever-increasing numbers. Others upon whose help he once relied are going into defense plants, where wages are higher and hours shorter. As a result, thousands of acres of crops are still unharvested.

The matter is made worse by the lack of new farm machinery, and of materials, equipment, and help for making repairs. Farming cannot be done without machinery any more than a battle can be won without adequate fighting equipment. The allotment of certain very essential machinery in certain areas is really pitiful.

Certainly we do not intend that the war effort shall be hindered by lack of food. Let us then insist upon action at once that will insure to agriculture the necessary manpower and the essential machinery.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN].

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, I am interested in procuring food—an abundance of food—for the American soldiers, who are fighting all over the world, for the American people, and for such of our allies as may need it.

In order to get that food we must have manpower, machine power, and feed for the livestock, poultry, and other animals on the farms on which the food is produced.

According to the latest information received from the Department of Agriculture, the Federal Government will take for lend-lease and Army and Navy purposes approximately 25 percent of the beef that is produced in the United States this year, up to 40 percent of the pork, about 30 percent of the eggs, approximately 20 percent of the butter, 45 percent of the cheese, 50 percent of the condensed and evaporated milk, 30 percent of the lard, 25 percent of other edible fats and oils, approximately 60 percent of the canned fruits and 45 percent of the dried fruits, 50 percent of the canned vegetables, 15 percent of the wheat, and 20 percent of the rice.

It will be seen, therefore, that nearly 25 percent of the essential production of food in the United States will be used outside of our country, and for our armed forces in 1943. In order to produce this food, we must have feed for our livestock, for our poultry, our hogs, and other animals on the farms, and I am interested at this time in trying to extend the ability of the farmer so that he may produce additional feed for his livestock. Section 3 of the bill is a proposal which was made by me in the interest of increasing the amount of feed for dairy cattle. We are going to have a big shortage of butter in this country. In 1943, as long as the war lasts, we will have a shortage of milk. It is now predicted that within 30 or 60 days we will be rationing butter and other dairy products.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman agree with me that our real food shortage may come after the cessation of military hostilities, in the demand on us for foodstuffs to take care of people in other countries?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. There is no doubt about it, because the demand from those countries upon us will be terrific. We will be called upon to supply foundation dairy stock for the people in other countries of the world, which will mean a shortage of supplies for the people in the United States. If I had my way I would cut out all restrictions upon every type of essential food production in the United States. There is no reason for trying to continue regimentation and control over the American farmers so that they will produce less at a time when the people of the country will go hungry, because of a lack of food within our borders.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Yes.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Does not my colleague think it would be a wise procedure for the great Committee on Agriculture to look into that point, with the idea of bringing before the House a measure which would do just that?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. We have talked about that in the Committee on Agriculture.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 minutes more.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I am sorry but I cannot yield. We have talked about it in the committee, and with the exception of cotton I think we are pretty well agreed that all restrictions on production should be eliminated for the duration of the war. We have not yet agreed on cotton as to what is the best thing to do. My amendment simply provides with reference to corn that where a farmer has been given a corn-acreage allotment, he may be permitted to plant corn for silage in addition to the corn-acreage allotment, without being penalized. At the present time, if farmers plant more than they are allowed, they do not get the benefit payments, nor do they secure the loans provided in the commercial corn area. My amendment removes the restrictions and when I speak here in behalf of section 3, I am talking for millions of small dairy farmers throughout the United States who are not now able to raise sufficient feed to take care of their dairy cattle. I do not speak for that group of large commercial farmers—and there are very few of them—who seem to think that the smaller farmer should produce less so that they can have the privilege of selling more corn. We are at war, we are having a terrific shortage of food, which will become more apparent as time goes on. The farmers are willing to produce food. They do not want subsidy payments or other benefits from the United States Treasury. We should give them opportunity to produce the corn and the other things we need to take care of the demands of our country, first of all to feed our men in the armed forces. We have a chance to demonstrate here whether we are going to stand by a regimented philosophy of scarcity, as has been practiced for the past 10 years under the New Deal, or are going to let farmers go out and produce to take care of the Nation and its food demands.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. RIZLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventeen members present, a quorum.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of the time on this side to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURRAY].

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, 30 years ago I was out in Fargo, N. Dak., and went to hear Billy Sunday preach a sermon. I remember he said that a lot of people go to church and sing "Throw out the life line, throw out the life line," when they have not enough pep to throw out a clothesline. When I realize what is happening in the way of producing food, I think of Billy's sermon. We have seen during the last couple of years the several departments and different groups pounding the farmers of the country on the back and asking them to produce more food.

There is one point I would like to present today. During many years we have not even been able to feed ourselves, and now they expect the farmers all at once to feed the whole world. For 10 years we have been importing more agricultural products than we have exported. The American farmer is now asked to:

First. Furnish food for domestic consumption formerly supplied by imports.

Second. Furnish food for our armed forces in ever-increasing amounts.

Third. Furnish food for lease-lend.

Fourth. Furnish food for the peoples of occupied countries.

This is a serious matter. It is not all tied up in this bill that is before us today, but I think the people from the district of every Member of this House, wherever he may come from, can be hungry just as well as the people from any other district. I think we have a responsibility—not in a sectional, not in a partisan spirit, but in a spirit of working with what we have in order to produce this food.

I think that statistically speaking we are still in a position to reach the goals we have been asked to reach.

The other day I called your attention to the fact that we fell down on crop after crop as far as acreage was concerned, and showed it was only due to the fact that we had a good crop year that the farmer accomplished what he did in the year 1942.

So in the consideration of this bill today the time has come when, as representatives of the people, we must decide what course we will follow. We must decide whether we will support Mr. Brown and what he is trying to accomplish through the OPA, or whether we are going to continue to pass laws, turn them over to the OPA, and then spend hour after hour on the floor criticizing the so-called bureaucrats for doing what we asked them to do by legislation on this floor.

It is a much more serious problem than most people realize.

There is one thing I have been watching for quite a little while. The mere fact that we appropriated money out of the United States Treasury—and I am not talking against incentive payments or anything else—but the mere fact that we "roll out the barrel" does not produce any more food for the people to eat. I am not so sure that a lot of people are not sitting down to omelets and roasts and other food products which they think they are going to eat in 1943, that has not been produced up to this time. In other words, we do not want to count our chickens before we put the eggs in the incubator.

I can prove this point easily because I have kept track of what is happening in the State of Wisconsin since the Agricultural Department put on an incentive payment of 3¾ cents per pound on cheese. I supposed that when they put this incentive payment on that product we would have an increase in the production of cheese. I follow it each week. I wish that any Member who is interested would look at this. The State of Wisconsin is holding its own pretty well. We are only down about 16 percent. But in the country as a whole we are producing from 23 to 28 percent less than we produced in the corresponding weeks a year ago. We had a subsidy, yet the subsidy did not produce the cheese. So this is an important matter. It is something we must iron out and work out together. It is something on which we cannot be sectional or partisan in our approach. Our obligation is help produce the food needed to win this war.

As far as I am concerned, I think the time has come when the O. P. A. and Mr. Prentiss Brown must either be supported or liquidated. For example, I dare say no one could dispute the fact that there is enough lard wasted in the United States at the present time, due to the fact that hogs are not going through the normal channels of trade to offset all the peanut oil we can produce in this country, even if we pass the bill that we have before us today. Thousands and thousands of hogs are not going through the normal channels of trade. Millions of pounds of lard are being wasted. We have either got to support Mr. Brown and the O. P. A.—set it up and have him follow it according to law, or else we have to go ahead in a hodge-podge manner as we are at the present time and take the risk of starving the people of the United States.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Yes, I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman give us a little additional information on what he means by supporting Mr. Brown and the O. P. A.? Will the gentleman expand on that a little?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I realize that there have been some strange things happen through the O. P. A. We hear them criticized. According to the bill brought out by the Banking and Currency Committee, there are not any of these ceilings on agricultural products put on without the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture. He must assume his share of the responsibility. We must, I repeat, either support the O. P. A. legislation, repeal it, or supplant it with something better.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. GRANT] such time as he may desire.

Mr. GRANT of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill amending the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, with respect to farm-acreage allotments, the farm marketing excess of wheat, the use of excess corn as silage for feed to livestock on the farm, to provide for the adequate supply of peanuts for oil and other uses.

The bill could be designated as a bill to win the war. I say this in all seriousness. I know that it is quite popular to tag a bill as a war measure in order to secure its passage. However, insofar as peanuts are concerned, it is absolutely necessary that this legislation be immediately adopted so that this Nation may have sufficient food in order to meet the civilian and military requirements. It has been said that food will win the war. If this be true, it certainly can be said that lack of food will lose the war.

We all know that the war in the Pacific has cut off the importation of vegetable oil and that as a nation we are faced with the responsibility of finding a replacement. This replacement, in the main, lies in cottonseed, soybeans, and peanuts. The peanut is one of the best, if not the best, sources of vegetable oil and the Department of Agriculture has, therefore, requested that the acreage allotment in normal times of 1,610,000 acres be increased to 5,500,000 acres.

Under the present law, each year there must be set up a national acreage allotment sufficient to supply only the edible trade. Ordinarily peanuts are produced for the edible trade as other competitive oils are cheaper and are, therefore, more widely used.

The Office of Price Administration has placed a ceiling on vegetable oils which will not cover the cost of production.

Heretofore, we have had a two-price system for peanuts; one price for edible peanuts and another for excess peanuts which were produced for oil. It has been difficult to explain why there should be a two-price system because all peanuts cost the same to produce. Naturally, the two-price system has been brought about by the low price of vegetable oil, only a few peanuts being necessary for this competitive business, and peanuts grown on allotted acreage being sold for edible purposes and bringing a much higher price.

However, the war has now changed the whole picture. It is of vital necessity to our war effort that we have more vegetable oil, not only for civilian and military use but for lend-lease shipments. I was recently told by a person who had returned from a visit to one of our allied countries that the people when given lard, or vegetable oil, would spread it upon bread and eat it. The human body must have fats and oils to properly function and it is up to this Congress to do everything within our power to aid the production of these fats and oils.

Regardless of the price of peanuts, I am afraid that we will fall far short of the acreage requested by the Department of Agriculture. This will be due to farm labor shortage and also shortage of farm machinery equipment.

This bill provides that for the years 1943 and 1944 all peanuts produced whether grown on excess, allotted, or unallotted acreage shall bring the same price. This act also provides that the producer shall not lose his allotment as these will be continued after 1943.

I can assure this House that the farmers of my section are going to do everything within their power to increase the peanut acreage. Many of them have lost their help by reason of the Selective Service and are being handicapped because they are not able to secure proper farm machinery equipment. In spite of these handicaps, they are going forward to victory, keeping ever alive the motto, "Food Will Win the War."

This administration has requested the increase in peanut acreage. This House must help make this increase a reality by the speedy enactment of this legislation.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for 35 minutes.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, the statement was made yesterday on the floor that special study should be made of this bill. I want to thank those who made that suggestion. I intend within the time allotted to me to give you all I know about peanuts and peanut legislation, and I hope you will do me the kindness to follow me closely.

Before doing that I want to make reference to frequent remarks that were made on the floor yesterday, one this morning, and practically every day, to the effect that the time has come when the entire farm program should be repealed and the farmers of the Nation should be turned loose without any planning or any regulations. I think this complaint has become general enough, certainly among the Members of Congress, to justify a hearing by our committee on that subject, and on yesterday I asked our chairman, the gentleman from South Carolina, if he would not immediately undertake a complete and exhaustive hearing and let the people who are interested, the Members of Congress who feel that way, come before the committee. Personally I have some doubt that you really want to do that. There seems to be a general misunderstanding of how the programs stand.

There is a limitation today on only three commodities: One is wheat; this is limited to 55,000,000 acres, simply because when you begin to gather wheat this year you will have on hand 660,000,000 bushels, the biggest surplus ever known in the history of the world. If you plant much more you will not have any storage facilities. The W. P. B. has already granted all the metals they can to build storage places for wheat. Canada has a 2-year supply of wheat on hand, Australia has an enormous supply of wheat, and Brazil has a 2-year supply of wheat. For these reasons the acreage of wheat is still limited.

The acreage on cotton is still limited because, to begin with, last year when we were harvesting our cotton crop we had with that crop in the field 24,000,000 bales. We cannot consume in this country over 12,000,000 bales, and in order to do that, every textile mill must run 24 hours a day every day in the year; consequently, your consumption of cotton is limited by your textile-mill capacity. There is a shortage of long staple cotton, and for this reason there is no limitation, and, as a matter of fact, an extra premium is being paid to farmers to get them to grow more long staple cotton.

The other limitation is on tobacco. The tobacco crop was increased 10 percent this year. It is felt that in these times when, as someone has said, we may have to feed the world, the day may come when it is much more important to have a piece of grease, to have a piece of bread, than it is to have a cigarette or a chew of tobacco. There are those who advocate the removal of all programs. I do not see it. Those who advocate the elimination of all planning of farm programs during this emergency are, in my judgment—hear me—doing the same thing as if they were advocating abolishing the War Production Board, abolishing the planning commissions in the Army and the Navy, that we send Mr. Nelson home, and that we tell the manufacturers of this Nation: "There are no strings on you; there is no planning; we need lots of war materials; you can build whatever you please."

What would be the result of that? No Member of the House, I say, would care to suggest it. What would be the result of that? Why, the manufacturers would build those things they are best equipped to build; would they not? Secondly, they would build those things which would pay the greatest profit; would they not? All right. Let us say that the easiest thing to make is tanks and their manufacture shows a good profit. There would be no limit and no specifications as to the tanks he manufactured. If we followed that policy generally, we might wind up by having 5,000,000 tanks and not a machine gun with which to equip them. Or, let us say it is planes; we would wind up with 5,000,000 planes and not a motor to go in them. Is there anybody on the floor who would advocate that? What is the difference between planned industry and a planned farm program? Unless we have someone somewhere planning the needs of this Nation and of our armed forces, how is the man in California going to know what the man in Pennsylvania is planting? How do we, as individual farmers, know what is needed most?

The gentleman from Minnesota has mentioned corn. There is but one restriction or requirement today with respect to the production of corn and that is that, together with their corn, they must plant a certain amount of war crops, soybeans, flaxseed, peanuts, or something else. They go to the Minnesota farmer and tell him, "You can plant all the corn you want after you put in 4 acres of soybeans, or 3 acres of flaxseed." Is that wrong?

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. I cannot yield now.

If we can take a General Motors Corporation plant, which has made automobiles and nothing but automobiles, and absolutely put them out of the automobile business, destroy their business, if we can take your boy and put him into the armed forces and send him to the battle line to give his life, is it such a terrible thing to tell the farmers of Minnesota or Georgia that we are planning this program so as to supply what we need to win the war, that all we ask him to do is to put in 5 acres of soybeans, or 10 acres of flax, or a few acres of peanuts, or Irish potatoes? That is the only regimentation on the farm you have today. It is a program necessary to win the war. There may be some who think that you can win this war on a hit-and-miss policy. For myself, I do not think so. I do hope, and this is all I intend to say on the subject, that the chairman of my committee will order an immediate hearing on the proposal to repeal every law on the statute books with regard to farm legislation, abolish, if you please, the Department of Agriculture and turn the farmers loose, and we will see whether you are for it when you get the full facts. I do not believe you will be. That is all I want to say on that, except I wish you would do some thinking.

Mr. HALLECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. On that point?

Mr. HALLECK. Yes.

Mr. PACE. I yield.

Mr. HALLECK. As I understand, it is contemplated that $400,000,000 be appropriated for payments under the Soil Conservation Act. Does the gentleman think that amount of money is necessary in view of the fact that that is almost as much as we had away back in the time when we were using those payments to cut down on the so-called soil-depleting crops?

Mr. PACE. The gentleman will have to get the detailed information from my colleague from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] who informed me that the majority of that appropriation for payments to be used as an inducement for increased production and in no instance and in no case will a dime be used for reducing production.

Mr. HALLECK. I thought the Appropriations Committee had turned down the proposal that sought to pay $100,000,000 for incentive payments.

Mr. PACE. They did, but that was an extra $100,000,000 for certain special war crops.

Now, I want to get to section 4 of the bill.

Mr. CASE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. I am sorry. I hope to finish quick enough to permit questions. I am going to run right through this.

Yesterday one of the Members of the House came to me and jokingly said, "Why should I vote for a peanut bill when there is not a peanut grown in my State?" Of course, he was joking with me, but it tempts me to say that there is not a Member of this House who should not be vitally interested in section 4 of this bill, which is the peanut section.

This bill contemplates the setting up of a program where there will be produced this year 850,000,000 pounds of the finest protein meal in this Nation—get that, 850,000,000 pounds of peanut meal—which is among the best in protein value. There is not a Member of this House, I dare say, who has not been called upon in the last 3 weeks by the poultry and cattle producers and dairymen of this Nation with regard to the shortage of meal. Am I not correct about that? With the enormous increase in livestock and poultry there is today a very acute shortage of meal, very critical, for both the poultrymen for mash, for the dairyman, and for the cattle raiser. Therefore, no man who has an interest in producing sufficient cattle, poultry, and dairy products for the needs of the Nation should have any opposition to this bill.

Secondly, besides 850,000,000 pounds of protein meal, this bill will produce 600,000,000 pounds of vegetable oil. There is not any commodity hardly, not excepting airplanes, that is needed more than is vegetable oil, fats, and oils, if you please just grease. About 8 weeks ago I was in the office of the Secretary of Agriculture talking about this bill. He turned to me and he said: "Last week there was sitting in the chair which you now occupy the purchasing agent for the Russian Government crying like a baby." I said, "Mr. Secretary, what do you mean?" He said, "He sat there with tears in his eyes and said 'For God's sake, Mr. Secretary, give us some grease.'" He said, "They do not wait to cook with it. They grab it in their hands, they spread it on a piece of bread and they eat it like a starving child." Those may be the fellows who are going to be our salvation, and I feel like it is my duty and your duty to do anything possible to produce every pound of grease we can to send to Russia and to supply our own people.

That is why I think everybody in this House should be interested in this bill.

The impression was created among some of the Members that this is preferential treatment for peanuts. In the first place, not one single thing will be done for peanuts that is not also done for every oil-seed crop. There will be considerably more money spent on soybeans than will be spent on peanuts. There will be as much at least, and probably more, because the price is higher, on flaxseed than on peanuts. The fats and oil program is one whole program, and every commodity in it is to be treated just exactly alike. The only reason we are here today is to ask you, with the consent of the peanut producers of this Nation, to put them in position to produce this oil and meal.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. I cannot yield. I am going to get to that period a little later.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Tell us why it is necessary to take them out of the general bill then?

Mr. PACE. I want to tell you all I know about the peanut situation. About 6 years ago peanuts were bringing approximately $40 a ton. At that time it was costing about $80 a ton to produce them. Last fall the best estimate is that it cost about $121 a ton to produce them. This bill authorizes a price of $129, so do not be afraid anybody is going to get rich out of it. We went to the officials and showed them that we could not produce peanuts for $40 a ton. They said, "They are worth more than that for oil." They figured out what they were worth for oil—I have forgotten the exact figure—but say it was $50. The Surplus Commodities Corporation said, "We will give you $50. We will announce that we will pay $50 a ton and we will crush them into oil." That program was started. The announcement was made and it had the effect of raising the price of peanuts up to $50 a ton. The cost of production went up. The next year they raised the price to $60 and the next year to $70, speaking generally, the next year to $80 and in 1940 or 1941 to $90.

At that time cotton was around 7 or 8 cents a pound and peanuts at $70 or $80 or $90 a ton was a little better bet than cotton. There was an increase in peanut acreage because it was better than cotton. Then the Department of Agriculture called several of us in and said, "We are going to have to stop this diversion program. We cannot guarantee a price on peanuts with no limit on production, because it is beginning to cost the Department too much money."

It cost them $3,000,000 in 1939 and $699,000 in 1940. They said, "We can no longer put a price support under peanuts and let the acreage expand all over the Nation if it will cost the Government too much." We realize that that was a sensible position for them to take.

We then introduced the bill to put peanuts under marketing quotas. In practically every respect it is like the law on cotton, corn, wheat, and rice. It was just like the law in regard to all the other commodities, that all the producers had the right to vote, and they would get allotments in accordance with their past-production history.

The referendum was held. About 90 percent of the peanut farmers of this Nation voted in favor of quotas. It was for a 3-year period, for the years 1941, 1942, and 1943.

Under the law, as in the case of the other controlled crops, the producers are entitled to 90-percent-of-parity loans. So the peanut producers are entitled in 1943 to marketing quotas, acreage allotments, and a guarantee of 90 percent of parity. Ninety percent of parity would be around $140. They had a free market in peanuts last fall, and in my section the price of peanuts went up to $200 per ton. I want you to bear that in mind, and then remember that this bill fixes a price of $129. Peanuts sold in my district for $200 a ton. That was the price the old producers, as I am going to call them, received last year and what they are entitled to receive this year, 90-percent loans, 90-percent protection on price in a free market up to the ceiling.

When the Japs attacked Pearl Harbor they cut off the imports, naturally, that we had been receiving from the Philippines. That meant the loss of over 1,000,000,000 pounds of vegetable oil, cocoanut oil, copra, palm oil, and so forth.

Last February the Secretary made efforts to make up that loss. He went to the soybean producers of the Northwest and said, "We want you to increase your acreage three or four million acres." He went to the peanut producers of the South and said, "We want you to increase your peanut acreage," He went to the flaxseed producers and said, "We want you to increase your flaxseed acreage."

Mr. Henderson at that time had put a ceiling on all vegetable oils, which reduced the value of peanuts for oil purposes to only $80 to $85, so that is all Mr. Wickard would pay for the 1942 crop.

We were therefore faced with the situation of having one producer getting $80 for the peanuts he produced while another producer was getting as high as $200 for them, although merely a fence separated the fields in which these peanuts were grown and it cost as much to produce one as the other. That created a very unhappy situation, as you can easily imagine.

Last September a group of us on the committee began working on this bill. You talk about hearings, we have had farmers in from every section of the Nation. The farmers had a mass meeting in North Carolina and Virginia and sent a committee of 14 up here to study this bill, and they O. K.'d it. Farmers have been here from Texas, they have been here from Georgia, South Carolina, and Alabama. This bill is the result of 5 months of negotiations.

The bill involves a substantial loss on the part of the old producers because they are entitled to quotas. They have taken their cuts for 2 years, and they are entitled to quotas this year under every moral right. You and I have not the right to take that away from them unless we can give them something in return. Under this bill it is provided that during the war the quotas are canceled, their 90-percent loans are canceled, and they are required to accept a price of 85 percent instead of 90 percent of parity. In consideration of that sacrifice on the part of the farmers, this bill provides that after the war is over their quotas will be restored to them.

It has been intimated here that special treatment is being accorded the peanut producers. I placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD yesterday afternoon, so you would have it available this morning, two letters from the Department of Agriculture. These are the support programs that have been announced so far.

Flaxseed is supported at 93 percent of parity. Bear in mind that this bill limits the price to 85 percent of parity for peanuts. Flaxseed is supported at 93 percent of parity and peanuts at 85 percent of parity; soybeans at between 105 and 115 percent of a comparable price, as no parity has ever been set up for soybeans; hogs at 90 percent of parity, not less than $13.50 a hundred; chickens at 90 percent of parity; turkeys at 90 percent of parity; eggs at 90 percent of parity; milk at 90 percent of parity; potatoes at 92 percent of parity; dried beans at 90 percent of parity; dried peas at 90 percent of parity; sugar beets at $11 a ton; naval stores at 90 percent of parity; and others in proportion.

Somebody, for a good cause or not, attempted to create the impression on the floor yesterday that this bill was giving special treatment and a special price to peanut producers. The law states—I have the law here, and everybody knows it as the Steagall amendment—that when the Secretary asks for increased production of any farm commodity he must guarantee the producers 90 percent of parity.

All in the world this bill does is this: In order to help the new producers, to whom the Secretary of Agriculture in 1942 paid only $82 for their peanuts, the old producers have come in and said, We are willing to submit to an amendment of the law to suspend quotas and allow an unlimited production of peanuts during the war; we are willing to give up the protection of 90 percent of parity so that the new producers can be brought up to us, so that everybody will get the same price for peanuts. If we are accepting the least price in the book, how can anybody charge that any special treatment is being accorded to peanuts?

Let me explain the bill now. It simply says that for 2 years, in the hope the war will be over in that time, marketing quotas on peanuts will be suspended; there will be no control and that for those 2 years the price shall be 85 percent of parity; that for those 2 years there will be no marketing quotas, but in consideration of the surrender made by the old producers that after the war is over their quotas will be restored and any excess acreage that is planted in peanuts during that period will not be the basis for an allotment. Then the bill provides that the edible trade shall continue to receive at least the quantity of peanuts they have received in the past. That was requested by all the manufacturers.

This bill does not provide 1 penny of subsidy. By voting for this bill you do not vote for a subsidy, but I do not want to mislead you. A subsidy program has been arranged for flaxseed, for soybeans, for cottonseed, for peanuts, and for every other oilseed crop.

I do not know exactly how much it will cost, but if it goes through, I can tell you what the peanut crop will cost. As I said before, this bill provides for the production of 600,000,000 pounds of oil and 850,000,000 pounds of meal. The ceiling on peanuts has now been fixed at $169, and this bill assures the producers $129 per ton. The ceiling has been fixed at $169 per ton, and that is what the manufacturers of peanut butter will have to pay for peanuts. They are going to cost the Government $129. Therefore, on 635,000 tons, the Government will buy peanuts for $129 and sell them for $169, making a profit of $40 a ton, or $25,400,000. The program contemplates that there will be 1,000,000 tons of peanuts for oil. They are worth for oil about $83. The producers will get $129 per ton. That means that there will be a loss of $46 a ton on 1,000,000 tons of peanuts, making a loss of $46,000,000 and a profit of $25,400,000, or a net loss of $20,600,000.

The same treatment has been set up for soybeans, except that it costs more money, and the same for flaxseed, and I presume the same program will be set up for cottonseed. What difference does it make? Much of this oil will be bought for lease-lend, and in paying a subsidy of $20,000,000 to keep down the price, in order that the producers can produce it, what difference does it make between that and raising the market price by $20,000,000, and then lease-lend coming and paying the extra $20,000,000 for the oil?

This bill is not what I want, but it appears to be the best we can do under present conditions.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. Yes.

Mr. HOPE. Some question was brought up on the floor yesterday, and in some way those who spoke gave the impression that there was something in this particular bill which established or created a subsidy on peanuts. I would like to ask the gentleman if there is anything in this bill which establishes or creates a subsidy as far as peanuts are concerned?

Mr. PACE. There is not. This bill does only two things. It suspends quotas during the war, and it reduces the protection of the farmers from 90 percent down to 85 percent of parity, providing that after the war is over they will get back the situation as it was before.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. Yes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. If peanuts are not being accorded any different treatment than that given soybeans, under the Steagall Act of July 1, 1941, then why the necessity for passing this law? Why not leave the matter now just as it is, just as they were, just as soybeans and flaxseed are concerned, if peanuts are not being accorded any different or better treatment under this act?

Mr. PACE. They are not.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Then it must follow that if they are not then there is no occasion for this law.

Mr. PACE. When the Secretary fixed the price of excess peanuts last year at $82, it was less than 90 percent of parity. We demanded 90 percent of parity as provided by the Steagall amendment. In order to get around that law the Secretary of Agriculture set up a new and different and so-called comparable parity on peanuts for oil. Over my protest and vigorous objections they set up a separate parity, which the gentleman from Wisconsin and most everybody else says was unfair, and put down the price to $80.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I am sympathetic but there was no parity for soybeans, as I understand it, and it is fixed at 95 percent of that, is it not?

Mr. PACE. Soybeans are fixed at from 105 to 115 percent of a comparable price.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Under the Steagall amendment it is 85 percent.

Mr. PACE. But the October 2 stabilization act made it 90.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Even so, is it not true there was no parity price for soya beans?

Mr. PACE. But they have all been adjusted on an equality basis—flaxseed, soya beans, and peanuts.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Now, is it not true that there is a parity price for edible peanuts of something like $149 a ton?

Mr. PACE. And that is the only parity.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. But with a comparable price for the oil peanuts around $3.60, or $3.40, or $75 or $80 a ton.

Mr. PACE. I cannot tell exactly what the difference is, but the law fixes the parity price and there is no authority to take peanuts or wheat or anything else and set up a separate parity for the different uses to which they are put. If you did, you would have a parity on wheat for feeding, you would have a parity on wheat for bread and a parity on wheat for breakfast foods.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. What is the parity price now and what was it on July 15, 1942, on edible peanuts?

Mr. PACE. About $148.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. And what was it on oil peanuts?

Mr. PACE. One hundred forty-eight dollars.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. No, no. I beg your pardon. The July 15, 1941, price as fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture on oil peanuts.

Mr. PACE. I said just now, in order to overcome the Steagall amendment and pay the producers less than it costs to produce them——

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman answer the question and give us the price of oil peanuts as fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture July 15, 1942?

Mr. PACE. If I have it, I will.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. What was it, approximately?

Mr. PACE. Approximately $80.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. That is about 4 cents as against 8 cents for edible peanuts?

Mr. PACE. That is right.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Eighty-two dollars a ton for oil peanuts as against $149 for edible peanuts?

Mr. PACE. Yes; and this bill is to correct that condition.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is it not true that under the terms of this bill peanuts will be the only basic commodity that will be permitted for 2 years to produce unlimited production?

Mr. PACE. It will not. Every other commodity except cotton, wheat, and tobacco can be produced without limit and has a 90-percent guaranty of parity prices if the Secretary asks for increased production.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman give us a little more light on this fact. The gentleman has emphasized the sacrifices which the farmer makes in dropping from 90 percent down to 85 percent.

Mr. PACE. That is the old producers.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is it not true that the old producer, under the old plan, received a 90-percent benefit only on that portion of the crop which was covered by the quota? In other words, any excess he had was not eligible for the 90 percent?

Mr. PACE. That is right.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Under this bill there is no such thing as an excess?

Mr. PACE. None at all.

Mr. CRAWFORD. He receives 85 percent on everything?

Mr. PACE. Across the board.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I think it is fair for us to say that there is no sacrifice involved in that. That is a good horse trade. I think that is a good horse trade for any grower of peanuts.

Mr. PACE. Assuming that the old producer is going to plant some excess; yes; but in Virginia and North Carolina, where they do not have the acreage, those producers will suffer a terrific loss, because they cannot expand their acreage. They cannot plant many excess peanuts, and they are taking it on the chin simply as a patriotic duty, and I think it one of the most splendid gestures I have ever seen.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That part II of subtitle C of title III of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 377. Notwithstanding any other provisions of this act, for any farm (or in the case of rice, for any person) which has in 1942 an acreage allotment for any commodity, except wheat, under the provisions of this title, the allotment for any subsequent year shall not be reduced on account of the failure to plant, harvest, or market, in whole or part, the commodity in any of the years beginning February 1, 1943, and ending December 31 of the year in which the President by proclamation or the Congress by concurrent resolution declares that hostilities in the present war have terminated, if such failure was due solely to—

"(1) The shifting from the production of the commodity to the production of one or more needed war crops, in accordance with the request of the Secretary; or

"(2) The owner, tenant, or operator having entered the military or naval service; or

"(3) The owner, tenant, or operator being unable to secure adequate farm equipment and machinery or farm labor (including tenants); or

"(4) Any combination of the foregoing.

Any determination by a county agricultural conservation committee under this section may be reviewed only by the State agricultural conservation committee. For the purpose only of determining State and county allotments under subsections (a) and (b) of section 334, in the case of wheat, the acreage which shall be considered to have been planted to wheat for harvest in each year of the period beginning January 1, 1943, and ending December 31 following the date upon which the President by proclamation or the Congress by concurrent resolution declares that hostilities in the present war have terminated, shall be the acreage which the Secretary determines would have been planted to wheat for harvest in such year except for one or more of the reasons set forth in (1), (2), (3), and (4) above."

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-four Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which is at the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that his amendment is out of order at this place if there are any other amendments to the first section, and the Chair understands there are. If the gentleman will withdraw his amendment until the amendments to the first section are considered, the Chair will then consider the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I withdraw the amendment at this time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. RIZLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for 10 minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. RIZLEY. Mr. Chairman, we do not have time this afternoon—at least I do not within my allotted time—to discuss with the very able gentleman from Georgia and others the merits of the triple A program. I am indeed glad to know that he has called the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that there is considerable sentiment in this country for taking the restrictions off of many features of agriculture and that we may have full and complete hearings before our committee in the near future in respect of the matter.

Mr. Chairman, this bill we are now considering well illustrates the fact that when we attempt by legislation to control the natural law of supply and demand we usually get ourselves into serious difficulty. This bill and the debate thus far well illustrates that fact.

A few months ago we had an ample supply, and in many instances a surplus, of many commodities of which there is now an insufficient supply and in many cases an alarming scarcity.

It was only a few months ago that we decided to add peanuts to the so-called basic farm commodities. After this was done, it was, of course, necessary, if we were to follow through, to give peanuts the Government crutch and treat this commodity with the same consideration and respect that we were giving the other basic commodities by making Government funds available for loans and thus guaranteeing a minimum price—just as we were doing for the other so-called basic crops.

All of this required legislation by Congress and the giving to Government agencies control of the farms and farmers. We now always refer to them as bureaucrats.

We asked for it, made it possible, and we got it.

Of course, we did not authorize or expect these agencies or bureaucrats, or whatever you wish to call them, to wholly ignore not only the spirit and intent of many of these legislative acts in their administration of them.

We find, however, that they not only ignored the spirit and intention of the Congress in the interpretation that they put on many of these laws, but in many instances they violated the exact letter and provisions of the act, and it is because of the refusal of the O. P. A. and the Department of Agriculture to obey the law that this Congress passed, and to follow the directions in the price-control bill and establish ceilings for the price of vegetable oil at a place where the farmers can produce peanuts for oil without a loss to them in the production of the peanuts, that makes this bill necessary.

In other words, if the O. P. A. would follow the intent and direction of the Congress, and if the Secretary of Agriculture would do what he was directed to do in the price-control bill, and if the Department of Agriculture would devote its time to looking out for the interests of agriculture and the interests of the farmer instead of someone else, this bill would not be necessary.

Now, what are we to do about it?

We are told, and we know, that one of the most critical needs of the Nation today is an additional supply of fats and oils—particularly vegetable oils. In fact, the need has already become so urgent that a great deal of time and study is under way to determine the minimum amount on which the human body can maintain normal health.

Of course we all agree that our military and naval forces must be maintained at the maximum rather than the minimum requirements. All of our allies in this war, and particularly Russia and England, are in most urgent need of additional fats and oils.

This means that we must produce more of the oil-producing crops, such as soybeans and peanuts; and so the word has gone out to the farmers who produce the peanuts that we must have a huge increase of acreage. The only way we can do this is to undo what we and the farmers who grew the peanuts did, when in 1941 we made quotas effective for 3 years. By legislation we placed control for 3 years on the farmers and on the acreage that they could plant.

But now, we are at war; and the war has changed the picture, so far as peanuts are concerned, just as effectively as it has changed the picture in many other respects.

The same basic reasons underlie the necessity for the other provisions of this bill. Feed for livestock is becoming a serious problem. Dairy farmers not only need silage, but the beef growers must have something to take the place of cottonseed cake and cottonseed meal and soybean cake.

I have received hundreds of letters and telegrams in the past few weeks from farmers and ranchers in my district and State, telling of their inability to obtain cottonseed cake and cottonseed meal and soybean cake.

Yes, the war in a dozen ways, both directly and indirectly, has changed the feed picture overnight, so to speak, and so this legislation provided for in sections 2 and 3 of the bill is apparently necessary to augment our feed supply so that we may have dairy products and beef for our soldiers scattered throughout the seven seas and all over the world.

Yesterday my very good friend from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] rather facetiously kidded the members of the Agriculture Committee—of which I have the honor of being a member—of adhering to the old familiar doctrine of "you scratch my back and I'll scratch yours." He indicated that the members of the committee interested in corn, though not interested in peanuts and wheat, were willing to go along because they were getting something for corn; that those interested in wheat, although not interested in corn or peanuts, were willing to go along because they were getting something for wheat; and that those interested in peanuts, although not interested in corn and wheat, were willing to do something for corn and wheat so that they could get what they wanted for peanuts.

Well, admitting for the sake of argument but not conceding that my friend may have more or less correctly analyzed the positions of some of us on the committee, nevertheless I am sure my friend must concede that while we may have been a little selfish in looking out for what seems to be the best interest of our own district or State, that in view of the peculiar circumstances of the times brought about by the impact of war and perhaps by too much governmental control and planning for the farmer, does make the sum total of the legislation necessary.

Mr. Chairman, I am not unaware of the very pertinent observation made yesterday by the distinguished and very able gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] as to the dangers which this sort of legislation forbodes. I am just as alarmed and concerned as is he about the payment of subsidies under whatever name, and I am in full accord with the action taken by his subcommittee on agricultural appropriation in rejecting the request for $100,000,000 to finance incentive payments to farmers. The farmers do not need financial incentives to be patriotic. All they ask is a decent price for what they produce. The farmers do not want subsidies. All they want and all they demand is that they have a price including labor costs, at the home market, with a ceiling low enough to protect the consumer against an unreasonable or inflationary price.

There is no use of trying to kid the farmer any longer. We know and he knows why some of those in high places prefer the payment of subsidies over a cost plus reasonable return to the farmer at the local market. Did not some of them let the cat out of the bag when they said if they discontinued the payment of subsidies they would lose control of the farms?

No, my friends, be not deceived, the program of Mr. Brown who is now the Director of O. P. A., and the program of those for whom he speaks, has not changed. It is the same program he advocated before he became a "lame duck" and while Mr. Henderson was still at the head of the O. P. A.; and that is, to keep farm prices down and soothe the farmer with subsidies, while coddling certain other groups with increased wages and giving them a free hand to fix their own formulas.

The labor formula includes living costs with no ceiling; and yet when the farmer asks for inclusion of his labor costs, he is offered a hand-out to be apportioned by the swivel-chair bureaucrats in Washington.

In view of what is taking place, I think it is a fair statement to say that some of those in high official places are more interested in soft soaping the consumers through a subsidy program, hoping for their votes, than they are for the general welfare of either the farmer or the country.

Because of the emergency, I shall reluctantly support this bill, but just as soon as possible we should by legislation assist the farmer in extricating himself from some of the mess we find him in today.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to try to boil this thing down as much as I can in 5 minutes. First of all, I think it proper for some of the Members who were not here in 1937 to know that I was the one member of the committee who opposed the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 on the Democratic side.

The Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 had some quota provisions in it to which I took direct objection, and to which I still object. The farmers, in order to cast a vote on whether or not a quota shall be put into effect, are either told by county agents or in voting booths are confronted with the statement that unless quotas are in effect, no loans will be available to the farmers. This is not in accordance with my conception of the proper way in which Americans should exercise the franchise on any question.

We come now to a situation where we are relieving certain farmers producing certain crops from burdens which were fixed upon their shoulders as a result, first, of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, and, second, by the Price Control Act. There is no other reason for this bill. My distinguished, beloved, and learned friend, the gentleman from Georgia, STEVE PACE, has with every bit of genius and ability he possesses made repetitious calls on both the Department of Agriculture and on the O. P. A., making efforts properly to represent his constituents who produce various crops, and particularly with reference to this bill, peanuts, to see if some little wisdom could not be got through the strange thickness which apparently existed between their ears providing for a certain price on oil which would permit all producers of peanuts to receive at least the cost of production. Failing in that, of course, the only remedy the gentleman had was to present a bill such as this, not to relieve farmers from actual depression, not to relieve farmers from the evil of their own ways and practices, but as a matter of fact, God willing, to see if he could not do something to relieve them from the pressure of ill-devised legislation and administration of legislation which in all candor has manifested in so many ways and degrees the complete disregard for the letter of the law and the intention of Congress. My time does not permit me to go into this phase of it.

Now, we are confronted with a bill which provides for the production of an essential war material, oil. What are we going to do about it? We do not have the Agricultural Adjustment Act up here for consideration. We do not have the Price Control Act up here. We have only one act. We have this act to provide ways and means by which farmers may produce a crop which is part and parcel of the program involved in the war effort. Oil is the basis of the major argument in this bill.

I said yesterday that I regret very much finding myself in the position of being called upon to even vote upon such a question. When I do vote, I am going to offer an amendment to the bill. I am going to vote for this bill with the greatest of repugnance that has ever confronted me. I have never voted for a bill which I was quite so much opposed to as I am to this one, but I am going to vote for it for the simple reason it is the only means at hand to meet this situation.

In the future, God willing, I hope the Congress will get together and do something with reference to channelizing the laws which they pass in order to control the administration of those laws within proper channels, and will not give to the administrative branch of the Government and those charged with the administration of the laws powers in excess of powers which we, the Congress, possess. We cannot delegate powers we do not have, yet those powers are exercised down here by the administrative branch. There are many things the Congress cannot do that they do. We are on the horn of the dilemma and I have stated my position.

Mr. BALDWIN of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BALDWIN of Maryland: Strike out section 1 and insert the following as a substitute for the bill:

"That subtitle B of title III of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, and paragraphs numbered 1 to 9, inclusive, and 12, of the Joint Resolution entitled "Joint resolution relating to corn and wheat marketing quotas under the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended,' approved May 26, 1941, as amended, shall not apply with respect to any crop planted or harvested prior to the date of the termination of hostilities in the present war, as proclaimed by the President."

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment as not being germane.

Mr. BALDWIN of Maryland. May I ask the gentleman from South Carolina to withhold his point of order for the time being?

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I withhold the point of order if the gentleman wants to speak on his amendment.

Mr. BALDWIN of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for an additional 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BALDWIN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BALDWIN of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, first I want to apologize to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture for not having expressed my sentiments on this legislation before the committee, but being a new Member and just becoming acquainted with the procedure of the House and the various ramifications of its operations, I will have to plead guilty to ignorance on the subject until I heard the discussions yesterday.

The amendment I offer to this bill is probably not germane and the point of order which the gentleman from South Carolina has made, or will make, will probably be sustained. But I want to take this time to discuss some of my views in reference to the activities of the Department of Agriculture as they relate to crop control and farm allotments. I intend to have presented to the Committee on Agriculture a bill which will do that which my amendment is intended to do; that is, suspend for the duration of the war all the activities of the Department of Agriculture that relate to crop allotments and quotas for farm products during this emergency.

In this, my first address to the House, may I say that I have nothing but the highest interests of the farmers of this country at heart. I am a farmer myself; I have been engaged in farming all of my life, and I have never been engaged in any other business. I know the feelings of the farmers; I know what the rank and file of the practical farmers are thinking today, and I say to you in all fairness and with all due respect to the Department of Agriculture that the activities of that Department during the last few years have done more to hurt the farmers of this country than any other one thing that has been done.

The Department of Agriculture has an admirable staff of trained research experts. It was created as a research department. It was created to do the things that the people wanted done in the way of experimentation, control of crop diseases, and things of that kind, but we find it has branched out to become a bureau, the main desire of which is to regiment the farmers of this Nation. I do not want it and I know the farmers of this Nation do not want it.

The provisions of this Agricultural Adjustment Act are not so harsh today because we are at war and the demand for farm products is exceptionally great, but I submit, Mr. Chairman, if this war had not come, and if the activities of the agricultural administration had prevailed up to this time, every crop raised in this country would have had a quota. We would be licensed by the Department of Agriculture; we would be regulated in every activity that we could pursue in any form in this country.

I have heard a lot said in this House about regimentation. The farmers of this Nation constitute the largest single individual group in this Nation and when you put that many people under license and control of a Government bureau you have no longer freedom of action and free enterprise in this country. You are regimenting people in the largest single enterprise in this country who do not want to be regimented, people who are resourceful, people who have initiative and industry, the conservative people of this country, and the backbone of this country. If you ever have to come to the people who will come back and save our constitutional form of government and the right of individuals to pursue their business as they see fit, you will have to come to the farmers.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BALDWIN of Maryland. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MOTT. Can the gentleman give us his opinion from his long experience as a farmer with reference to why the farmers of this country generally have so long acquiesced in this program and why they have so long taken the handouts and voted for the administration that gave those handouts to them?

Mr. BALDWIN of Maryland. I will explain that, but before explaining it may I say to the gentleman that I can speak to him in good faith on this subject.

For the last few years I have been operating one of the largest truck farms in Maryland. I have been eligible to receive farm payments and subsidies because of the size of my operations, but I have never asked for nor accepted 1 cent from the Federal Government in payment for any crop, because I believe it is unsound and going to lead to chaos in agriculture as well as have an adverse effect on every other business in this country.

The farmers do not want this regimentation. It was put over by the promotion agencies of the Department of Agriculture. We have a Department of Agriculture doing a good job in carrying out the purposes for which it was created, and it is doing a worth-while service for the people of this country. However, there drifted into the Department of Agriculture a philosophy of government under which the Department thought that they could by their promotion work and activities guide the farmers of this country. Every bit of this legislation has been made effective through the various agencies of the Department of Agriculture, such as the Extension Service in every county in the State. These agents have advised a certain selected few of the farmers that this law is what they want.

In my own county we had this experience in connection with the wheat-quota program. Out of 4,000 wheat farmers, 400 voted on the subject, and approximately 60 percent of the 400 voted in favor of the program. The ones who did vote for it were men who had been receiving benefits from this Administration, who were the wards and the favorites of the agents of the Department of Agriculture. They were organized by the men who wished to perpetuate this system.

A great majority of the farmers throughout the country who are opposed to it are not organized. Naturally the farmer will take it when an agent hands him a check, but the farmer who is taking it realizes this system is unsound and wants to get rid of the shackles. He has had enough of it to see where it will lead if this program is continued. It will mean to him that he or his children and his family will be regulated and restricted in every activity and every farm operation from now on if this practice continues.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield

Mr. BALDWIN of Maryland. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHORT. I am reluctant to interrupt the able gentleman, who is making such a splendid and sound statement, but is not the only purpose of benefit payments to maintain political control over the producers of this Nation?

Mr. BALDWIN of Maryland. I will not agree with the gentleman on that point, because this program does not have any relation to either party. It started years ago and has culminated in what we have. The roots and the seeds of it started many years ago.

Mr. SHORT. I am not blaming any particular party, but is not the purpose of it to maintain control over the producers of the Nation by these bureaucrats?

Mr. BALDWIN of Maryland. To maintain control; I would not say for political purposes. I would say it is because they have a philosophy of government they believe is ideal, and they want to impose it on the will of every farmer in the country.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BALDWIN of Maryland. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MOTT. Then the gentleman would say that the method used by the Department of Agriculture in getting their program over and having it acquiesced in by the farmers is a method of debauchery of the farmers by this Bureau?

Mr. BALDWIN of Maryland. We have the same situation among the farmers as obtains in labor. We have the professional farm organization men who are out to save the farmer. The rank and file of the farmers have just as much voice in what is done as labor generally has in the activities of radical labor representatives.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. BALDWIN of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, a number of other Members want to speak on this bill, so I shall have to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina made a point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I insist that the gentleman from South Carolina assign his reasons for the point of order.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a point of order is not pending.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I reserved a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina reserved a point of order. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the subject under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again read? Most of us did not hear it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The Clerk again read the Baldwin of Maryland amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Maryland on the point of order made by the gentleman from South Carolina as to his amendment.

Mr. BALDWIN of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, my amendment eliminates for the duration the activities of the Department of Agriculture in allotting farm acreage for any crop. This bill, H. R. 1605, as presented to the House deals with certain specific crops. While my amendment deals with other crops in addition to these, it still deals with the same subject matter, crop control and crop allotment for all agricultural purposes. The reason I submitted the amendment in this way was because of the necessity of food production at this time. I thought the more speed we could have in eliminating the restrictions by the Department of Agriculture in the production of farm crops, the better this Nation would be. I intend, as I said a moment ago, to introduce bills covering the subject matter contained in my amendment. I realize as well as all the rest of the Members that we are going to have serious problems affecting agriculture after this war is over, but I say to you in this reconstruction period, if the Government again is ever called upon to spend money to help industry, particularly the farmers, let us spend that money to correct the cause and not just as a subsidy, a continual subsidy year after year, because I submit that after the war expenses have been paid the Treasury of this country will not have any subsidies to spend on any crop.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, may I be heard on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, the title of this bill is "To amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, with respect to farm acreage allotments, the farm marketing excess of wheat, the use of excess corn as silage for feed for livestock on the farm, and to provide for the adequate supply of peanuts for oil and other uses, and for other purposes."

Under that title an amendment providing for the postponement of operations of any part of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 is germane, and the House is entitled to consider amendments that relate to that purpose. This amendment clearly relates to that purpose, and, therefore, it is germane, and in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BALDWIN] in effect strikes out subtitle B of title III of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 as amended. The purpose of the bill before the Committee of the Whole limits itself to amending subtitle C of the Agricultural Act, and the Chair is of opinion, taking into consideration of course the statement of the gentleman from New York, that it would, in effect, repeal other sections of the act, not included in this bill. It goes away beyond the scope of the present bill and the Chair thinks it is, therefore, not germane to the bill and sustains the point of order.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, Henry Thomas Buckle, in his History of Civilization in England, said that the greatest reforms of the English-speaking race had consisted not in doing something new but in undoing something old. I am convinced now, as I was convinced years ago, that the present farm program is a detriment to the small farmer.

I said then, when the first Bankhead bill was proposed, that I feared we would live to see our small farmers gnawing the corncob of economic inequality. That prediction has come true. But I did not expect to see the man who advocated plowing up my cotton and killing the pigs of the country eating muskrats as an example to the rest of the Nation.

This farm program has enriched the big planter to the detriment of the small farmer. The present policy of regimentation is driving us toward the same disaster that the Russian program brought to the Russian farmers in the Ukraine in 1933.

If you will take these bureaucrats off of the backs of the farmers of this country, pull the leeches off, stop the special interests from skinning the farmers, and let those farmers raise what they want to raise and what they can raise, then they will produce the food and the fiber to feed and clothe this country and supply our allies.

I am not at all enthusiastic about this bill. I feel somewhat as the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG] said he did. It may be the least of two evils under the circumstances, but I would much prefer to have a bill here that would take off the American farmer these restrictions that are hampering him as he has never been hampered before.

The cotton farmer makes a cent an hour for every cent a pound he receives for the cotton he produces. Today cotton is 19½ cents a pound, which means 19½ cents an hour, for his work, toiling in the hot sun, while the man in the factory is drawing on the average more than 80 cents an hour, and yet you are stripping our farms of young men for the armed services or putting them in these factories, where in many instances they have three or four times as much labor as necessary to do the work and where laborers are given special exemptions. As a result, agriculture in this country is on the downgrade at a time when we need agricultural products as we never needed them before.

Something must be done to relieve this situation. I am in favor of stripping the statute books of all of these restrictions, turning our farmers loose, and letting them go ahead and make their own crops in their own way.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. PACE. And does the gentleman advocate the same thing in industry in this Nation, turning the matter loose to the manufacturers?

Mr. RANKIN. My honest opinion is that if you would turn the manufacturers of industry loose, and take these labor racketeers off their backs, we would get more munitions manufactured for the same amount of money and in the same length of time. Yes, I say to the gentleman from Georgia, I favor that policy.

Mr. PACE. So the gentleman does not think there should be any plan so far as munitions are concerned?

Mr. RANKIN. We have a Navy Department, a War Department, and an air force. Let them state what they want and the manufacturers of America will produce it, if you just give them a chance.

Mr. ROWE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. ROWE. Is it the gentleman's opinion that American industry, as well as the American farmer, only needs to know what is needed, to provide it?

Mr. RANKIN. American industry is just as patriotic as American bureaucracy. The American farmer is just as patriotic as any bureaucrat that ever lived, and if you will turn them loose and give them a chance they will produce everything we need.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL: On page 1, after the enacting clause, strike out all of section 1 and insert a new section, to read as follows:

"To suspend laws, regulations, and orders which restrict the production of agricultural commodities. That, until the day following the date on which the President proclaims that hostilities in the present war have ceased, all provisions of law, and of regulations and orders, which restrict, authorize the restriction of, or by the payment of benefits have the effect of restricting the production of any agricultural commodity, are suspended."

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Will the gentleman reserve the point of order until I discuss the amendment?

Mr. FULMER. I reserve the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina reserves a point of order against the amendment, and the gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Chairman, I regret that this type of amendment is being objected to as not germane to the bill. When I heard the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BALDWIN] I knew it would be ruled out on the same ground that my amendment would be ruled out, because it extended to a great many of the other laws and acts which I feel should be done away with for the duration.

Not long ago I rose to discuss H. R. 1003 which I introduced on January 11. I submit that if this amendment, which embraces the provisions of H. R. 1003, were adopted today, or better yet, if H. R. 1003 itself were adopted, it would constitute an absolute cure-all for every bit of trouble which the farmer is having with his production problems and for all the problems he is facing for the duration of the war.

The farmers of America have been assigned a gigantic task, one that should entitle them to having all the shackles and hindrances taken away from them, so that they could proceed in an orderly manner to produce to the limit all the articles of food which our allies, which our armed forces and which our civilian population must have if we are to win this war.

The other day I accused certain officials in the Department of Agriculture of selling the American farmer down the river. I repeat that charge today. I say that the Department of Agriculture has failed to interpret the laws as Congress intended those price-regulation laws to be interpreted.

Not long ago there was testimony before the Committee on Agriculture which showed that the officials in charge of the parity-price program, which was passed last November before the Seventy-seventh Congress adjourned, were deliberately taking the law into their own hands and manipulating the prices as they saw fit. They failed to follow the instructions of the House which definitely set forth that the highest monthly average from January 1942 to the following September should be the basis on which to fix farm prices. It was admitted before our committee by one of the officials that they had disregarded this interpretation of the law and had proceeded as they saw fit. I cannot condone them for this shortcoming. I do condemn them for another thing. Not only did the Department of Agriculture officials take the bull by the horns and interpret the law as they wanted to, but certain officials therein were additionally bold. They went out and deliberately tried to defeat certain Members of Congress for reelection. That is a matter of record before the Committee on un-American activities. It was proved that one of the head economists in the Department of Agriculture was a clearing house for the handling of immense sums of money which went toward the defeat of many Representatives in this House.

I think it is high time that the Congress took some kind of controlling measure to regulate such procedure.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I yield.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I note in the report concerning section 4 it is stated that the necessity for section 4 comes about because of the refusal of the Office of Price Administration to set a decent price, a price which is equivalent to cost of production, upon vegetable oils. Is that a fact?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Yes.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. What arises in my mind is this: Do we as a Congress have to become subservient to the Office of Price Administration and come here and pass legislation designed to give the peanut grower cost of production just simply because the bureaucrats down in the Office of Price Administration refused to do what is right?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. We pass these laws here in Congress, but after they are passed they are interpreted and carried out the way the bureaus want, and not according to the intent of Congress.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I cannot yield further, I am sorry.

I do not know how other Members view the attitude of the people back home, but I say very frankly that it is getting in my hair. I do not know how much longer they are going to stand for the red tape and the deliberate malfeasance—it is nothing short of that—of some of the officials who are supposed to be running the various departments of this Government. I do not know how long the folks back home are going to countenance continual inaction on the part of Congress to liquidate these bureaus, but I do know that there is very great amount of dissatisfaction over this inaction.

Mr. BONNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. BONNER. Does the gentleman remember the predicament the farmers were in in 1932? Or does he have any knowledge whatsoever about it?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I do not know anything about that. But I want to say that a decade of the present policies put into operation by the Department of Agriculture has had the most devastating effect that could be imagined upon the American farmer, and the 10 years just past were but a prelude to the catastrophe which is now descending upon the farmer and hampering him in every way he could be hampered, making it impossible for him to proceed in a constructive way to increase production at a time when it is so badly needed.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I yield gladly to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. My very able but young friend did not make such close observation of matters in 1932, but does not the gentleman remember back that far to know that we were not eating horse meat at 29 cents a pound?

Mr. BONNER. If the gentleman will yield, I will remind the gentleman from Kentucky that the farmers were riding around in Hoovercrats then.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 1 additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I yield.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I am sure the gentleman wants to be fair about this, but will the gentleman tell us frankly and conscientiously whether the condition of the farmer is worse today than it was during the last days of Hoover in 1932?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I have but a few seconds left, but I will answer the gentleman by saying that right now in my section the farmers cannot even get rubber boots to go out and shovel manure. The farmer has not got a chance to follow out the program our Government expects him to follow—in other words, to produce food for our Army, to produce food for our allies, to produce food for our civilian population. I submit that unless some action is taken we are going to fail in our attempt to meet these demands. In my opinion, he is in the worst condition in the history of our entire Nation.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The gentleman has not answered my question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Chairman, I will state, as did the gentleman from Maryland, that my amendment is far-reaching. It seeks to cure a lot of the present evils that we are now beset with, and if it were passed it would allow the farmer to go ahead with a constructive program.

I believe that if my amendment were adopted it would be germane. I feel that it is a definite remedy, a panacea, and that it will do everything and a little bit more than the amendment which was offered previously.

I hope the gentleman from South Carolina will withdraw his point of order and that the Chair will sustain this amendment, and I ask that due consideration be given to this.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule.

The gentleman from South Carolina makes a point of order against the amendment on the ground that it is not germane to the present bill, because it goes beyond the scope of the present bill.

The gentleman has offered an amendment which is very far-reaching and clearly goes beyond the scope of the bill. It is not therefore germane to the bill.

The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words and ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Chairman, this bill is beset with many errors like every other Government-controlled law dealing with the business of the farmer. We have here 12 photographs which show the inefficiency in the failure of the agricultural agency to place in a warehouse the 1942 peanut crop. I know they pay their favorites in the Farm Security Agency for doing stenographic work more than we pay our county judges and sheriffs in Oklahoma, and they have a a peculiarly bureaucratic, inefficient method of selecting men to compile forms, and the very burdensome forms they compile are so complicated that not 1 percent of the Members of Congress can fill any one of these forms out to save his life without help; but notwithstanding all these complications, and in spite of all these regulations of regimentation, I am for this bill, and hope amendments will be offered that will make it work better.

I am for this bill, because we cannot help thinking of the favors which the Congress, our legislative and our executive branch of government has given to organized labor, has given to capital generally, the banking, industrial, and the mercantile world. We cannot forget that back in the dark days of the Hoover administration when this Congress lent a hand to mankind by large appropriations, and brought him up to his social and business status of today, you tried to correct a very grave evil. Let us not draw a line of demarcation between the farmer and the unorganized group of labor on the one hand and organized labor, industry, and capital groups on the other. By the way, the unorganized group of labor is seven times greater in number than the organized group, but they do not have the power or organization to crack the whip to where they can scare those in authority.

Let us run these labor racketeers, these bureaucrats, out of the Government. Let us fix it by law. Let us give it some serious study. Let us take these matters before the proper committees and give serious thought and study and remove the power of decision that is lodged in some of these greedy, incompetent bureaucrats, and may I add, manned by Communist-minded in many respects, who are trying to get the farmers into some such communistic or communistic front organization.

I want to remove paternalism from government and go back to the sound old principles of democracy that men may freely express their views and that each and every individual in this democracy will have an equal opportunity with everybody else. The chances are that we will not all be on an even keel; in the end there will be the strong and the weak, but we will be born equal and have an equal start in life.

We talk about the Ruml plan; we talk about taxes being too high and that the contractors who made the millions in 1941 and 1942 want to forget 1942 and begin a new pay-as-you-go plan and be forgiven their 1942 income taxes. Surely we should think of the millions of dollars that the labor racketeers garnered from our farmers, businessmen, and others in charging very excessive dues and fees, all of which was free of taxation, exempt from paying income taxes. Yet we object to a semipaternalistic bill to appropriate forty or fifty or a hundred million dollars to help the farmers of this country. If we could guarantee parity to the farmers, we could do away with all of these laws of a paternalistic nature, and we can do it if we have the courage and will get down to the milk in the coconut.

You know, we have laws now that not only discriminate between certain classes in favors received from the Government in dollars and cents but we have a class that is exempt from violence or threats of violence, while if you or I should commit the same crime we would be dealt with by the laws of our land. Do you think that is right? You know it is not right, regardless of any man's affiliations with any kind of an organization, fraternal or otherwise. These people should not have any more privileges under the criminal code of our land than our farmers have, and it is up to us to straighten out these discriminations against the commission of crimes, exemption from paying income taxes of the great masses, as we go along.

I want to get back to the bill. Every amendment that I shall offer is a constructive amendment, an amendment that will give private dollars lying in banks bulging out with money a chance to be used against our Government tax-paid dollars, and I hope you will support the amendments. We would like to take the Government out of business as soon as conditions will permit, and we hope that we can reach the point that we can get the Government clear out of business before too long. Do you remember back yonder in the dark days a certain man who handled a gavel in a certain deliberative body being in the banking business? If I remember correctly, he borrowed from one of the then Government agencies in those days $90,000,000 that possibly the Government had to charge off.

Mr. O'KONSKI. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEWART. When I conclude. If that is true, why quibble over half of that much to protect all the farmers of America? May I say, without becoming personal about it, I did not mention the name of the borrower. Can you figure out who I have in mind? I am talking about one individual. This bill will not cost the Government half as much, if the statement is correct, as that one lost loan.

Let us hope that we can do something constructive for agriculture. Support every constructive amendment. I appreciate the remarks made by the farmer from Maryland. It would be wonderful if all of our farmers were farmers of his kind; then we would be represented as well as any other group in America.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, may I see if we cannot agree on a limitation of time? We want to get through with this bill tonight. I appreciate all of the speeches, but if we keep this up we will be here very late. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section close in 15 minutes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that I intended to offer to this section.

Mr. FULMER. On this section?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, make it 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER]?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I do not know how many people want time to speak on this bill.

Mr. FULMER. That will take care of the Members who are standing.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gentleman from Maryland has an amendment he wants to offer to this section and he will probably want to be heard on it, and the gentleman from New York wants to be heard.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, make it 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 25 minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, further reserving the right to object, I see two additional Members rising for time.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, I rise not to object to any specific part of this section 1 because I think it is highly desirable that we make these provisions to protect the farmer who is not able to carry on his farming operations during the war on account of conditions brought about by the war, which is all that section 1 does. I feel, however, that I could not allow this matter to go by without saying for the record just a few words in regard to the greatest of oil and feed-producing crops of the Nation, which crop was overlooked by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia when he so eloquently discussed the need for additional vegetable oils.

The gentleman from Georgia did mention that there was such a thing as cottonseed, but we get a wrong conception of this whole question of vegetable oils and particularly of high-protein feeds if we do not give consideration to that greatest of all oil-seed crops, the greatest of all producers of vegetable oil and protein feed, cottonseed.

There is no crop known to man that compares with the seed of the cotton plant when it comes to producing vegetable oil and the high-protein feed on which our livestock, our dairy, and our poultry interests are so dependent. Cottonseed makes up the bulk and the backbone of the vegetable-oil feeds produced in America. Cottonseed is the bulwark of our high-protein feeds. It does not make any difference how successful we may be with the programs we hope to inaugurate during the coming year; even granting that they are 200 percent successful, we would still be faced with a shortage of both vegetable oil and high-protein feed if we do nothing about cottonseed.

There is but one source from which you can meet the needs of this Nation as far as vegetable oils and high-protein feeds are concerned, and that is cottonseed. It has produced the overwhelming bulk of those supplies during the years past. Five million acres in peanuts will not change that situation. We have grown as high as 49,000,000 acres of cotton in the United States. We get 2 pounds of seed for every pound of lint, and from that seed we have fed our dairy herds, we have fattened our beef cattle, and in recent years we have supplied the poultry and the dairy people and the hog growers with a large percentage of the important protein feeds in their mixed feeds.

Today we are faced with a shortage; in fact, absolutely no high-protein feed can be had. We must recognize that this matter of high-protein feed is just as important as the production of vegetable oils. You cannot fatten all the cattle, you cannot properly carry on your dairy production, you cannot even properly carry on your poultry production, without a supply of high protein feed, and you must grow cotton in order to get it.

Do not think of the cotton crop simply as a fleecy staple, think of it as the greatest producer of high-protein feed the world has ever known. Then you will properly picture the cotton crop of this Nation and have some realization of the importance it has in American agriculture and in the question of feeding the American people in the coming years.

Mr. CRAWFORD and Mr. HINSHAW rose.

Mr. POAGE. I yield first to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. May I ask the gentleman from Texas, the largest cotton-producing State, to give the House his opinion as to why there is such a shortage of cottonseed cake and cottonseed meal at the present time?

Mr. HINSHAW. That is exactly the question I wanted to ask.

Mr. POAGE. The reason is that there is 27 percent more livestock in the Nation today than there has ever been before. We are feeding them heavier than we have ever fed them before. The poultry interests are relying almost entirely on the cottonseed, when in years past they relied on fish meal, meat scraps, and tankage imported from foreign lands. All the farmers over the Nation have learned after a long period of years that it is profitable for them to feed their livestock a balanced ration, including a substantial amount of cottonseed meal. And, of course, the gentlemen recognize that the acreage planted to cotton last year was less than one-half what it has been at times in the past.

Mr. BALDWIN of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BALDWIN of Maryland: On page 1, line 4, after the last word "amended", strike out the balance of the section and insert in lieu thereof "by amending section 376 thereof by adding thereto the following: 'Provided further, That such jurisdiction shall in no case be exercised as to any crop now planted or planted hereafter between the date of the enactment of this act and the date of the conclusion of peace.'"

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be glad to hear the gentleman from South Carolina on the point of order.

Mr. FULMER. I do not care to discuss the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from South Carolina indicate to the Chair in what way the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland is not germane to the subject matter of the bill?

Mr. FULMER. I do not believe it is in line with the real purpose of the bill, and it goes much further than we intended under the bill, so it is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Maryland amends the same section of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 that is covered by this bill.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, may I ask that the amendment be again read? Many of us did not hear it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again read the amendment.

The Clerk again read the Baldwin amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be glad to hear the gentleman from Maryland on his amendment, solely for the purpose of determining whether or not the amendment is germane to the section covered by the bill before the Committee.

Mr. BALDWIN of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, this bill amends section 377. To my mind another amendment that deals with section 377 is pertinent at this time.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman hear me for just a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield?

Mr. BALDWIN of Maryland. Yes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, this bill relates to part 2 of subtitle C of title III of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended. It provides an amendment with reference to the acreage, the allotment for commodities, by adding a new section, 377, in which there is an involved provision relating to proclamations, acreages, and all that sort of thing. In the report of the committee, so that this language might be intelligible, on page 5 attention is called to section 376 of part 2 of subtitle C, to which section 377 is proposed to be added. In section 376 is a provision for the jurisdiction of the courts, that have to do with the apportionment of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. That is the only authority they have to act. This amendment that the gentleman from Maryland has offered to that provision is an amendment which is clearly and entirely germane and which is entirely germane to the operations of section 377, which is offered here by the committee. This is a substitute to the same part, the same title, the same subtitle of the bill that has brought it in. It is clearly in order under the rule. There are several parts where the Agricultural Act is amended, and on page 513 of the Manual I remind when I read:

To a bill amending a general law in several particulars, an amendment providing for the repeal of the whole law was held germane, but the bill amending the law in several particulars must vitally affect the whole law.

It is apparent that it is entirely similar to the subject matter of the bill, that it covers an item entirely within the purview of the particular section, to which the amendment is offered. There is no question in my mind that it is germane to this bill at this point.

Mr. CASE. Mr. Chairman, will the Chair hear me on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE. Mr. Chairman, the section which it is proposed to amend by the bill under consideration is section 376 of subtitle B, part 2, entitled "adjustments of quotas and enforcements," and to the subtitle "court jurisdiction." The portion of the bill immediately under consideration is an amendment to that subtitle. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland deals only with the subject of jurisdiction, which is the subject of that subtitle. It merely provides that that jurisdiction shall not be exercised in a specified period of time. The amendment offered by the bill relates to periods of time, and, in fact, goes further than that. It seems to me the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland is germane, being restricted entirely to the subject of jurisdiction, which is the subject of the subtitle of the basic law under consideration.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I call attention of the Chair to the fact that section 376, which is sought to be amended, deals with one subject, and one only—the jurisdiction of the courts in the enforcement of the penalty provisions of the act. The provision in the bill under consideration, while an amendment to part II of subtitle C, does not in any way go to the enforcement of the act, through the courts or otherwise, but simply provides for a different method of making allotments to individual farms in the case of the basic commodities except wheat, and for making allotments to the counties and States in the case of wheat. It is a new section and does not touch anything at all under this subtitle except the method and procedure of making allotments. I submit that the amendment which the gentleman offers cannot be germane, because it applies only to the subject of court jurisdiction, which is not in any way involved in the committee provision.

Mr. CASE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CASE. Under the statement of the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. Chairman, is the amendment offered by the committee bill itself germane?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not involved in this. The Chair is ready to rule and interprets the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland to involve the question of jurisdiction and enforcement of jurisdiction for the whole act. His amendment provides that such jurisdiction shall in no case be exercised as to any crop. The bill before the Committee restricts itself to certain crops. The amendment of the gentleman from Maryland would in effect suspend jurisdiction to enforcing the entire Agricultural Adjustment Act, because it would do away with the machinery for such suspension, and, therefore, the Chair is inclined to rule that the amendment is too far reaching, and goes beyond the scope of the bill and is not germane, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Preferential motion offered by Mr. DIRKSEN: Mr. DIRKSEN moves that the Committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, let me assure the members of the Committee of the Whole that this is in no sense a dilatory motion. This motion is tendered in the very best of faith and in the earnest hope that the Committee will approve it so that the bill can be reported back to the House after the Committee rises with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken. I believe, from the discussion that has obtained on this floor both yesterday and today, that two things are quite evident. The first is that everybody is interested in taking the snarls out of this food program and in doing something for agriculture. The second thing that is quite evident is that there is a wide diversity of opinion on this floor right now with respect to this bill. Some object to section 4, which relates to peanuts. I object, among others, to section 3, which relates to the use of excess corn for silage feeding purposes. But the essential point I make in support of the preferential motion to strike the enacting clause is, that this bill does not solve the food problem which is before us now. One of our problems is manpower. The other problem is obtaining sufficient farm machinery for the farmers so that they may do their work. Only within the last few days we have repudiated the proposal of Secretary Wickard for $125,000,000——

Mr. HOPE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. HOPE. The gentleman complains that the bill does not solve the manpower or the farm machinery problems. Of course, the gentleman does not contend that the Department of Agriculture has any jurisdiction over those matters?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Let me continue for a moment and I will get to the gentleman's point.

There is the problem of manpower. There is the problem of farm machinery. There is the problem of prices. O. P. A. pegged the corn price under parity, and the gentleman from Kansas himself waxed quite eloquent in the Well of this House as to the illegality of that operation by the Office of Price Administration. Now we come along with a four-section bill which seeks to preserve the rights of farmers who for one reason or another cannot plant their acreage, a bill that deals with wheat penalties and affects only 3 percent of the visible supply of wheat, a bill that seeks to permanently change the act of 1938 with respect to corn silage for feeding purposes; and finally a bill which in my considered judgment provides a subsidy of $60,000,000 for the peanut crop. It does not go to the heart of the food problem. It does not touch the price structure. It does not mandate the Secretary of Agriculture as it should. I insist that the Committee on Agriculture come before us with an over-all bill that is based upon a sound perspective of the food problem that is before the country today. Until that is done we are going to have these constant recriminations and abuses over the failure of the food program and the derelictions of the Federal Government. Let us suspend this thing once and for all. Let us send it back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken and insist that this committee, which is disposed to find a solution for this problem, come back at an early date with an over-all program that will accomplish that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Let me say to the gentleman that if the bill were to be passed in its present form without amendment, I will support the gentleman's motion, but I believe the bill can be cured. Let me say that I agree with the gentleman that the present agricultural problem needs overhauling. I think I would say to him that a majority of the Members on this side of the aisle, as well as on the gentleman's side, will join him in overhauling it. But it has not been done and it cannot be done in a day or a week.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gentleman from Oklahoma knows as well as I do how abstruse and difficult of understanding this agricultural legislation is. It is difficult to spell out the implications of any amendment on this floor at the present time. Out of familiarity of 10 years with the subject matter, I try to do it and fail more often than not. I am not willing to torpedo this whole program, so I say let us send back this piecemeal legislation now and insist that an over-all, comprehensive program be brought before us that will deal with the problem from alpha to omega.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the preferential motion.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GREEN. Is there only 5 minutes on each side of this motion?

The CHAIRMAN. There are 5 minutes on each side of the motion. Five minutes have been consumed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], and 5 minutes has been allotted to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE].

Mr. GREEN. May I make a unanimous-consent request? I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended to 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] is recognized for 5 minutes in opposition to the motion.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the general attitude of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], it is that the restrictions and limitations on production should be lifted. Of course, he knows that such a program would take months in its preparation. Yet we have a bill here that says for corn all limitations on production shall be removed, and the gentleman is opposing it. We have a provision here that says on wheat, for all these millions of bushels of penalty wheat, now in storage, it may be fed by livestock producers; and the gentleman would have you send this bill back to the committee and deny them that privilege and wait for months and months until some other committee can present the matter. The Committee on Agriculture does not have jurisdiction over the manpower problem, nor has it jurisdiction over the farm-machinery problem. We have what the committee thought were four urgent and important measures or modifications of the law that should be made.

Certainly everyone is in favor of section 1 to preserve a man's allotments which he is unable to plant on account of manpower shortage, fertilizer shortage, or machinery shortage, or being drafted in the service. Certainly the House is entitled to pass on the question of whether or not the farmers should be permitted to feed their penalty wheat and not go through another 6 months or 6 years holding it in storage. Certainly the House should be given permission to say whether or not all limitations on the production of corn should be removed, which this bill does; and certainly the House should be permitted to say whether or not all limitations on the production of peanuts should be removed; and that is exactly what this bill does. The third and fourth sections of the bill are to do exactly that. If the enacting clause is stricken out, then certainly the penalty wheat cannot be fed; then, certainly, the farmers in the commercial corn area cannot plant this excess corn for silage; certainly the peanut producers will not know what to do. They cannot produce peanuts for $82 a ton like they had to last year, and you will not have your meal and you will not have your oil.

So, if you do not like a particular section, offer an amendment to strike it out and if the House strikes it out well and good, but I certainly hope the House is not going to ruin the entire work of the committee that has gone on over a period of months and months; and the committee hopes that the House will at least accord the committee and the Members of this House the privilege of passing on this bill section by section.

I know the gentleman from Illinois is very bitter against the corn section, but he should not carry his opposition quite so far as to seek to kill now, utterly and definitely, the remaining sections of the bill.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I may say to the gentleman that I think it would be a big mistake for the committee to vote in favor of the motion offered by the gentleman from Illinois, because we should have a chance to act on it paragraph by paragraph. Being a member of the committee I excuse myself, but it would be unfortunate, after the weeks and weeks these gentlemen have worked on the measure not to have it considered. There are certainly millions and millions of farmers in this Nation from the corn area, the wheat area, and the peanut area who are interested in this legislation. I hope you will give the House a chance to pass on it.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. All I know, coming from a city district, is that there is a very serious farm problem not only from the angle of manpower but from many others. We have all got to approach it temperately and intelligently. I am as anxious as anyone who has not got a farm in his district to do something constructive in the situation. I hope the leadership in this House on both sides of the aisle—constructive leadership, men representing farm districts—will try to meet this problem, having in mind not only the interests of the farmer but the interests of the Nation.

It seems to me, following the debate on this bill, that this bill is a step in the right direction, and certainly the motion made by our distinguished friend from Illinois would, in my opinion, constitute, if adopted, a serious blow to the strides forward we have already made in this session toward a solution of the farm problem.

I hope the amendment will be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired; all time has expired.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DIRKSEN) there were—ayes 93, noes 101.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. DIRKSEN and Mr. PACE.

The Committee again divided and the tellers reported.

The CHAIRMAN. On this vote, and the Chair is counting his own vote, the ayes are 109 and the noes are 109.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, there has been much talk about many things that are not germane to this bill. I come from Iowa, and you know what Iowa produces. I am interested in corn. There is nothing in this bill that helps corn, although I am not disposed to defeat the bill on that account. I voted against the motion to recommit just now. I want to help all farmers wherever they may be. But may I say to the folks here that we are not getting anywhere near parity on corn. I have in my pocket a letter from my son in Iowa who sold corn last week for 79 cents a bushel; whereas they will tell you that corn parity is $1. We do not have any corn in my section of the State, the greatest corn-producing area in the world, that brings parity, and this bill is not going to help bring parity.

They tell you that if you add the benefit payments to the parity payments you will get as much as parity, but that is unfair, dishonest, illegal, unconstitutional, and wrong, because when a man gets his parity payments and his benefit payments he has already earned them. He gives up something, he gives a consideration before he gets those payments, and you have no legal or just right to say that he should pay twice for the same thing and that such payments should be added to the parity price that he gets per bushel in the market.

Suppose you have 80 acres of corn and you are only allowed to grow 50 acres. You lose the benefit of the 30 acres, thereby you are paying once for that benefit payment, and it is neither the law nor is it common sense nor justice to say that the farmer is getting parity for corn when he is only getting 79 cents for it, and to use the argument that he should add the other payments to his unit payment per bushel. He pays for his benefit allowances in addition to and outside of his parity payment.

In the present bill there is a provision that every man may feed wheat to his own cattle and to his own chickens. That does away in large measure with our corn market. There is in the present bill a statement that silage shall not be added when you figure the corn allotment. That is not fair to the corn farmer because it just simply sets the whole thing free. A man who raises silage can raise all the corn he wants to raise besides his silage corn and still get his crop or benefit payments. The bill should be amended in respect of this matter. The silage provisions should be limited to the duration of this war, exactly the same as the other provisions are limited.

I say particularly at this point that unless something is done for corn to put it on an even keel with other crops, then Iowa ought not to vote for the bill because we are entitled to just treatment and we are not getting parity payments and we will not get it under the terms of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST]?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, they bring wheat over into the corn country and sell it for 85 percent of parity—of corn parity. They do not sell that wheat for 85 percent of wheat parity, no. They bring it to my door, the corn farmer's door and there they sell it for 85 percent of corn parity, thereby breaking the market for corn. This is unjust and unfair.

A little more than a year ago the Secretary of Agriculture in a speech at Atlanta gave notice that he intended to sell commodity wheat owned by the Government at 85 percent of corn parity and the next morning the corn market in Chicago dropped 4 cents per bushel. Such things as this have put corn farmers into great quandary and they wonder why these Government agencies always aim at corn and try to bring down its price in the open market.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I voted for the recent motion to recommit this bill, and I would like to take just 3 or 4 minutes to tell you why I voted as I did. There is an ancient maxim which says that "The least governed country is the best governed country." I have been here 8 years, and as time has gone on I have become more and more convinced day by day that that maxim is true.

As I sat here this afternoon listening to debates on both sides of the House on this bill my mind drifted back to a recollection of some of the agricultural history of ancient Rome. When bills of this character were introduced then on behalf of the farmers of the Roman Empire, it did not take them long to ruin the farmer.

Time and again during the last 8 years I have sat here and I have seen the distinguished representatives of the farmers from New York City, Chicago, Pittsburgh, and other great centers of population sponsor bills of this character. When I went back home and told my farmer friends of the wonderful legislation that had been passed for their benefit, they just could not understand why anybody would want that sort of a bill any more than I could. This morning I sat in a committee and listened to a group of packers telling the members of that committee that now, at a time when America needs beef and pork as it has never needed it before in all of its history, they are running about 25 percent of their capacity. It was explained to the committee that the reason they could not run at full capacity was because of the numerous regulations placed upon them by the Government.

Now, I am talking to you gentleman on the right here, my Democratic colleagues. I want to take your minds back to the time when your fathers told you that one of the great fundamental principles of democracy was equal rights for all and special privileges for none. You were also told that ancient maxim that the best-governed country is the least-governed country. I think that giving subsidies to the farmers is wrong in principle, just the same as it is wrong to subsidize any other group of our people, as a matter of principle. There is not a farmer in your district who will not tell you, if you ask him, that in his opinion he ought to have a fair price for the commodities which he sells. The law of supply and demand was placed here by the Creator of the universe, and it will work with unerring certainty in those things if you will just unshackle the natural forces and give the natural laws a chance to operate.

It seems to me that if we will free the farmer, if we will tear the shackles from him, if we will give him a chance to produce, we will see such a surge in production as this country has never seen before.

They say the farmer is getting more already than he ought to have for his crops. I was out in Missouri the other day, and I find the farmers out there are getting from 15 to 16 cents a pound for fat beef. I can remember in the last war when they were getting 26 cents a pound for the same kind of beef. The farmer today is restricted every time he turns around. Before he can plant an acre of this or that kind of crop he must ask somebody in Washington what he has to plant, and then he must hurry up and get it planted before this person in Washington changes his mind.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BELL. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Right along that line, under the peanut bill passed 2 years ago, some of the farmers could not even buy their seed to plant from the seed people from whom they chose to buy it, but had to buy it from a specified organization.

Mr. BELL. That is true. It got to the point last year where, you recall, if a farmer had a bushel of wheat he had raised on his own farm with his own labor he could not feed it to his own hogs. I know many a farmer who sold his hogs without fattening them just because he could not feed his own grain to the hogs—grain he had raised on his own farm.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BELL. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. REES of Kansas. The gentleman understands, does he not, that the bill before us lifts just a little the restrictions about which the gentleman is talking? It does give the farmer the right to feed his own wheat to his livestock. He does not have the right to do it now without being penalized. This helps a little.

Mr. BELL. It does not go far enough.

Mr. REES of Kansas. I agree with the gentleman, but it helps a little.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I take this time to ask a question, but first I want to lay the basis for the question.

I have been taught that a golden maxim of the law is uniformity. Certainly, if uniformity in the law is good, uniformity in regulations and in prices ought to be equally good.

We have had a number of meetings in reference to the peanut expansion in the United States. At those meetings my colleagues from the States of Texas, Arkansas, Louisiana, and other States were present. We met with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE]. It was my understanding, concurred in by others who were at that meeting, that there would be uniformity of price payment for the same kind and quality of product if this bill passed.

I notice on page 4 of the report of the committee in reference to the matter of the payment for peanuts produced in the different areas of the United States that the southeastern Spanish peanut is worth under this plan $130 per ton. The southwestern Spanish peanut is grown in the States of Louisiana, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Texas, and others, and that is worth $127.50 per ton. My question is, If that commodity is of the same character and quality, why is not the payment the same to the southwestern farmer as to the southeastern farmer?

Mr. PACE. The payment will be identical. Those are averages determined by the Department of Agriculture, dependent upon two conditions, the oil content of the peanut and the rating of the peanut. Most of the peanuts in the Southwest are what are called windrowed. They are left to dry on the ground. They are usually on an average graded slightly under those that are stacked and put in houses. Peanuts having the same grade and the same oil content, grown anywhere in the United States, will bring exactly the same price.

Mr. BROOKS. Then I understand this itemization on page 4 is wrong?

Mr. PACE. No. That is what the Department of Agriculture estimates on the basis of past history of grades and oil content will work out as a general average.

Mr. BROOKS. Does the gentleman mean to tell me that peanuts grown in the State of Texas of the same quality and character as those grown in Georgia will receive exactly the same amount as those grown in Georgia?

Mr. PACE. They will.

Mr. BECKWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROOKS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BECKWORTH. How can it be determined before the peanuts are grown and harvested that your peanut will be better than the southwestern peanut? We are not talking about past averages but peanuts that are to be grown from now on.

Mr. PACE. This table is prepared, I am told by the Department of Agriculture, on the basis of past averages. However, they have given us the positive assurance, and they have given that assurance to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. POAGE], who is here, that identical peanuts will receive the same price. That table is based simply on the past history of how they have graded peanuts as to grade or oil content. I am perfectly willing to give the gentleman the positive assurance that his peanut or any other peanut will receive exactly the same price, according to the grade and oil content.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, the vote just taken indicates the exact division of the present opinion of the House on this important measure. I fear that some of my colleagues who opposed this legislation have not given careful thought to the intent of the legislation. The intent of this bill is to give the farmer a higher price for the commodity in question (peanuts). It is all essential that we enact legislation to raise the price paid to the farmer, not only for peanuts, but also for practically every food farm commodity.

We cannot escape our responsibility in this by sticking our heads in the sand as an ostrich would. It is my responsibility and your responsibility to foster in every reasonable way the production of food for the American people. There exists now a scarcity of many essential food commodities. This scarcity will be intensified as time and the war goes on.

O. P. A. and Department of Agriculture ceilings on farm commodities should, in all probability, be absolutely abolished. I shall not be surprised if time may reveal to you and to me the necessity of such action and the absolute realization of such action by the Congress. I have appeared before War Manpower Commission Chairman McNutt; the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wickard; the Price Administrator, Mr. Brown; and others high in responsibility, and have endeavored to indicate to them the impelling necessity for a higher price for farm commodities—I mean a higher price to the farmer—if we are to have even a reasonable portion of the now necessary farm production. It appears difficult to impress upon these officials and upon you, my colleagues, the dire necessity for immediate action if food in adequate quantities is produced on the farms and on the stock ranges.

Very recently I received a most significant communication from a distinguished friend of mine, the Hon. K. K. Knight of Bunnell, Flagler County, Fla. He is a large farm and livestock producer, an honest, upright citizen, and one who thoroughly understands the problems confronting farmers in their production now. His communication follows:

BUNNELL, FLA. January 30, 1943.

Congressman LEX GREEN,

DEAR LEX: I thought I would bring to your attention the farm labor situation in this locality.

As you know, the largest percent of crops grown here are cabbage and Irish potatoes, with potatoes being the main crop.

Most farmers have about completed planting some 2 weeks late on account of labor, and would have been much later but there has not been a single day in January we could not work.

The harvest season will start in about 50 days, and if there isn't something done about farm labor for harvesting, I just don't know what is going to be the outcome.

Every farmer in this section, including Hastings and surrounding territory, is from one to six men short on his regular labor now and just can't get any.

They pay such high wages at these boat yards, airports, and other war work that the farmer just can't get anyone to work.

I have worked my labor 60 hours per week ever since December 1, 1942, even used all women I could get. If something isn't done about farm labor I'm going to have to reduce my operations, as well as the rest of the farmers. We cannot afford to produce the stuff when we cannot get labor to harvest it.

It is really critical around here.

It seems to me everyone should work at the very least 50 hours per week in times like this.

As long as the war industries are allowed to pay such high wages and still are guaranteed a profit the farmers will get no labor unless they are on the same basis.

I'm not in any position to try to make any suggestions to you, but I see some dark hours ahead of these farmers in harvesting season. I figure there will be many a potato not dug in this section if there isn't something done and done quick.

Crops are looking mighty fine now and if something don't happen there is going to be a bumper crop.

Just thought I would lay the circumstances before you and you might be able to help in some way.

Yours truly,

K. K. KNIGHT.

Now, my colleagues, in the Bunnell-Hastings-La Crosse, Fla., Irish-potato production areas, a ceiling price of $3.10 has been placed upon their early Irish potatoes. A large acreage is being planted. These producers have no assurance that they will be able to obtain necessary labor to gather these potatoes after they are produced. If the potatoes are not gathered and marketed, the consumers, largely city dwellers, will be the ones to suffer primarily. It is true that the producer will suffer large financial loss, but the city consumer will suffer more in the loss of his necessary food.

The same thing obtains in practically every food and livestock crop now in the process of production. Farmers have lost their employees to industrial war production and other high-salaried employment. They have lost also an unusually large number of their sons and other helpers to the armed forces of our country. The farm population of our country is ultra patriotic. I believe an excessively large percentage, comparatively speaking, of farm young men and women have gone to the armed forces. This is in keeping with their high principles of Americanism and patriotism.

The farmer may produce and harvest food for his own family first, which is absolutely justifiable and to be expected, but what I am trying to get to your mind is this: The one who will lack and suffer for food is ultimately the city dweller. My colleagues who represent the city dweller should be first concerned and should first vote for the bill which you are now trying to defeat. If you strike down this bill, it will set a precedent for you to strike down other bills which may be later presented to you and which have for their purpose also an incentive for increased food production. It is your responsibility, my colleagues, and you are confronted with the question of whether you desire to vote for more adequate food production or for scarcity and possible hunger of our city dwellers by defeating this legislation.

Farm wages of from probably 75 cents a day realized by the farmer himself to possibly $1.50 or $2.50 a day realized by his paid employee do not well compare with industrial wages of from 85 cents to $2 an hour. What are you who are fighting this bill going to offer as a substitute to bring about increased food production? I have not heard you on the floor this afternoon offer any substitute. You have merely spoken against the bill and against increased farm production, as provided by the bill.

I, too, try to represent city dwellers and in their interest I am supporting this bill. When food becomes scarce in the cities which I try to represent, they may hold me responsible for a short-sighted policy of limited production. If I should vote against this bill, I feel that vote would be for limiting farm production. How can you expect farmers and stockmen to produce when you do nothing to raise existing unfair ceilings placed upon their commodities? Sacrifices already made by farmers and producers of our Nation are unequaled in the history of the human race. And the dart which you are thrusting in them today, in opposition to this bill, is one which will rebound, I fear, to the hunger of city dwellers.

The responsibility is yours.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, we have had considerable debate upon this section of the bill. There are several other sections, and I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this section do now close.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BALDWIN of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. FULMER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section do now close. We wish to finish this bill tonight.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina that all debate on this section do now close.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BALDWIN of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BALDWIN of Maryland: Page 1, line 6, strike out all of section 1, after line 5, on page 1, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, That part 2 of substitute C of title III of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, shall not apply with respect to any crop planted of corn, wheat, or peanuts, or harvested prior to date of the termination of hostilities in the present war as proclaimed by the President."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Public Law 74, Seventy-seventh Congress, approved May 26, 1941, as amended by Public Laws 374 and 384, Seventy-seventh Congress, approved December 26, 1941, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(13) Notwithstanding any of the foregoing provisions, the farm marketing excess for any crop of wheat beginning with the crop harvested in the year 1941 and ending with the crop harvested in the year in which the President by proclamation or the Congress by concurrent resolution declares that hostilities in the present war have terminated, for any farm shall be reduced by the amount of such crop of wheat produced on the farm which the producer thereof after the effective date of the act feeds to livestock or poultry belonging to him, if the producer establishes the amount of such feeding to the satisfaction of the Secretary. Where an adjustment in the amount of the farm-marketing excess is made pursuant to the provisions of this paragraph, the difference between the amount of the penalty or storage as computed upon the farm-marketing excess before such adjustment and as computed upon the adjusted farm-marketing excess shall be returned to or allowed the producer."

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already recognized the gentleman from Oklahoma to offer an amendment. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WICKERSHAM: Page 4, line 3, after the period strike out the period, insert a comma, and the following: "And of any and all penalties imposed, charged or collected on wheat produced in the year 1941 in excess of 15 cents a bushel, the penalty shall be returned to or allowed to the producer."

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that that it is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa makes the point of order that it is not germane. Does the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. GILCHRIST. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. But, Mr. Chairman, I had been recognized and the gentleman's point of order comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the point of order does not come too late. The gentleman from Iowa reserves the point of order and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma for 5 minutes.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Chairman, this amendment brings back the old penalty again. Bear in mind the amendment does not endeavor to return to or allow the producers in 1941 the entire penalty. It merely returns or allows to them that portion of the penalty in excess of 15 cents. At the time this penalty was imposed upon the farmer he thought that there would be a 15-cent a bushel penalty on each excess bushel of wheat, but the penalty was considerably more. He either paid it or he made bond and stored the wheat. My amendment simply returns that portion which is in excess of the 15 cents. It does not break faith with the farmer. He pays the amount of the penalty that he ordinarily would have paid of 15 cents a bushel for that excess wheat. If a point of order should be made as to the germaneness of this amendment I would like to be heard by the Chairman.

I do feel that this amendment is fair, both to the Government and to the farmer. The farmer can take this additional money that he has paid or made bond to pay, he can buy Government bonds to help fight this war. He did not know he would have to pay 49 cents or 57 cents or 67 cents a bushel as he will have to pay now. This amendment only applies to the 1941 crop. He will still have to pay his penalty on other wheat, but it is not fair to penalize that farmer on the 1941 crop, when in fact, the penalty was invoked 2 days before his harvest started.

So I submit he is entitled to have returned that portion of the penalty in excess of 15 cents.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Facetiously I would like to ask this question: Does the gentleman think it is fair to make the farmer pay 49 cents a bushel and forgive and forget taxes that apply against the 1942 income which the industrial operators and industrial workers receive?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I do not think we are going to forgive any of the boys. We may "rumble along," but I doubt if we will "Ruml along."

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. What would the gentleman say as to the precedent that might be set if his amendment were adopted in the event any of this legislation were repealed with respect to penalties paid by other crops?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I would say that no other crop was affected like wheat. I happen to represent an area that raises not only wheat, cotton, peanuts, alfalfa, and soya beans but we raise everything down in Oklahoma, including children.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. The same precedent is involved in taxes or penalties levied under the statute. This could cause the Government to lose millions and millions of dollars if the gentleman's precedent were followed in other cases.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The Government will not lose a dollar, because they collected an amount to which the Government was not entitled. It either has collected it or it has not collected it. Some of them have not paid. They made bond.

Mr. FULMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FULMER. The same thing applies to cotton and all other commodities. When we passed the 85 percent of parity wheat went from 60 cents to $1. Cotton went from 11 cents to 20 cents. Cotton is in the same position as wheat.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. But there is some difference in that the wheat farmer had actually started harvesting his crop before the 49-cent penalty was put on.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. That is right.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. It was unfair to the wheat farmer. No wheat farmer would ever have sown his wheat if he had known the Government was going to impose such a confiscatory rate.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I yield.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Does the gentleman think there could be any common sense or rhyme or reason for penalizing the farmer for raising a little more wheat than the Government has set out for him to raise? Because some group has said that a certain quota should be allowed, if a farmer happens to go above it, is there any common sense, in view of the fact that we have to feed all the people of the world, for penalizing him for doing it?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Instead of producing 110 percent or 90 percent we will not likely produce more than 80 percent of the food goals for 1943.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Is not this the time to encourage him to raise more food rather than to limit him in the amount he shall raise, especially wheat?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I think we should raise everything we possibly can, and I will say that I doubt very seriously if we will have enough labor and enough implements to raise nearly as much as we need for lend-lease and for our soldiers, much less for you and me.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST] has reserved a point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GILCHRIST. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. WICKERSHAM] provides for the return of money. It provides that all penalties that have heretofore been paid in by anybody must now be refunded. The section to which the amendment is offered provides simply that an adjustment shall be made for payments that have not yet been assessed or allowed. That is, where a farmer has not yet paid the penalty he is to be excused from the payment of it. The proposed amendment goes much further and says that wherever any money has been paid, then that money must be returned from the Treasury to the producer. It goes far afield from the terms of section 2. I submit that it is an addition to section 2 that is not germane. I ask for a ruling on the point of order.

Mr. HOPE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kansas rise?

Mr. HOPE. I should like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman briefly.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the point of order is good and should be sustained. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma goes to an entirely different subject than that contained in this section. This section provides that in determining the farm marketing excess on any crop of wheat the amount of such wheat which a farmer fed to livestock shall not be counted. That is all this paragraph does. Then it states in conclusion:

> Where an adjustment in the amount of the farm marketing excess is made pursuant to the provisions of this paragraph, the difference between the amount of the penalty or storage as computed upon the farm marketing excess before such adjustment and as computed upon the adjusted farm marketing excess shall be returned to or allowed the producer.

It will be noted that the provision for returning or allowing the penalty refers only to a case where an adjustment is made "pursuant to the provisions of this paragraph."

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma is not confined to wheat that may be fed. He wants to return the penalty which has been paid upon any wheat marketed or fed since 1941. It seems to me that this is a much broader provision than is contemplated in the present bill. The bill relates to a recomputation of the farm marketing excess where wheat is fed after the effective date of the act. The gentleman's amendment provides for a refund of penalties already paid under the provisions of existing law. There is no relationship between the two things, and it seems to me it is very clear that the amendment is far beyond the scope of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Oklahoma on the point of order.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the language of the bill, on page 3, line 22, reading as follows:

> Where an adjustment in the amount of the farm-marketing excess is made pursuant to the provisions of this paragraph, the difference between the amount of the penalty or storage as computed upon the farm-marketing excess before such adjustment and as computed upon the adjusted farm marketing excess shall be returned to or allowed the producer.

By my amendment I do not add a new section; I merely add a portion to that section of the bill which returns to the producers, those that have not fed their wheat, any penalty they might have paid. The fellow who has already paid his penalty or who has already fed his wheat or disposed of it would not benefit. So I submit to the Chair that this is merely in line with this provision of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma provides as follows:

> And any and all penalties imposed, charged, or collected on wheat produced in the year 1941 in excess of 15 cents per bushell shall be returned to or allowed the producer.

The intent of the gentleman's amendment clearly is that it shall apply to all types of wheat raised in 1941; whereas, the purpose of section 2 of this bill provides only for the return of farm marketing excesses to those who meet those provisions pursuant to this paragraph.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma goes far beyond the provisions of section 2, which deals with a specific matter. The amendment is therefore beyond the scope of the bill and not germane.

The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a motion that the Committee rise and discontinue consideration of the bill and have asked for time in which to explain the motion. I offer the motion reluctantly because I have the deepest affection for those who are supporting the bill. We have served side by side in many a hard-fought battle for agriculture. But this is a bill to sabotage the legislative program so laboriously built up through the years. This bill is a proposition to dynamite the farm program—and the one farm program—on which all farm-minded Members of Congress and all national farm organizations are in complete agreement.

For 20 years we have been wandering in the wilderness in an effort to secure legislation which would put agriculture on a plan of economic equality with industry and labor—legislation similar to that already granted every other group and industry—in the land. At last we have succeeded in formulating a program which will give the farmer parity in the market place. It is the product of years of conference and research and legislative evolution. It has the approval of every national farm organization. It won the last election. It will win the next election.

It will produce the greatest amount of food in the coming crop year of any plan that has been suggested—and it is the only program that will produce sufficient food to adequately supply our wartime needs.

Of the various items in that program, the fundamental principle is its opposition to subsidies. The farmer wants no handouts. He does not want alms out of the public treasury and the taxpayers do not want him or anybody else to be raking subsidy handouts from the national treasury. The farmer asks only a parity price but he wants that price in the open market along with labor and industry and every other honest and self-respecting producer.

This bill violates every principle of that program. One of its least objectionable features is its subsidy for one crop. All other crops are left out in the cold. In no respect is it a national bill. It is a bill for three groups—three crops—three sections of the country. On the contrary, the accepted farm program is a national farm program. It provides for every product, for every crop, and for every section. It is for every star in the Union and every stripe in the flag. But this hybrid bill is both sectional and provincial. It is the mongrel offspring of an unholy alliance between industries and sections conceived in their own interests and the devil take the rest of us. It is calculated to divide our forces. It drives a wedge between farm groups who should be presenting a united front to the enemy. It is in contravention of the action taken by other committees of the House against subsidies and gratuities from the public treasury. It is in defiance of the platforms adopted last fall by every national farm organization in the United States.

Not a single farm organization approves this bill. Can you imagine this House approving a labor bill opposed by all the labor organizations in the country? Not a single farm journal in the Nation approves the bill. Even the Department of Agriculture does not endorse the bill. In fact, it is impossible to find anybody any where outside the floor here who can be said to be genuinely interested in national agriculture who has been urging the passage of the bill.

To pass this bill is to abandon the one program on which we have all been in agreement—the one program which we have any practical chance of translating into law—and the one program which, when adopted, will give all farmers everywhere an equal opportunity for parity of price and income and an American standard of living. To pass such a bill as this is to turn aside into a devious bypath from the broad highway marked out by united American agriculture.

Mr. COOLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. COOLEY. What section of the bill contains the subsidy provisions referred to by the gentleman?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Let us not quibble about technicalities. Everybody knows there is a $60,000,000 subsidy here for peanuts.

Mr. COOLEY. I differ with the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman differs with the obvious. And he knows I am his friend and the friend of the lowly goober. I joined with him and other friends not long ago to pass a bill to include peanuts as one of the basic commodities when there was no ground for such action by any criterion. The agricultural economists who wrote the original bill refused to include it and we had to use a legislative sandbag to get it in. I am willing to do the gentleman and the peanut every possible personal favor, but when it is proposed to destroy the agricultural program on which all American farmers must rely for justice for themselves and their children, that is another matter.

Let me plead—not only with the friends of the farmer but with the friends of the taxpayers and the few remaining friends of the United States Treasury, from which this money must be drawn, and who receive nothing in return—let me plead with those who favor a farm program which will feed our armies and our allies—to defeat this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not debatable, the Chair will inform the gentleman.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. May I ask whether or not a Member can get up, take the floor, and speak for 5 minutes, and make a motion which automatically comes to a vote?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] may have 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] on a point of order.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. A vote cannot be interrupted for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman from Georgia through with his point of order?

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, my point of order is to ask whether or not a Member can take the floor, and upon the completion of his remarks offer a motion which is not debatable, and take all other Members off the floor?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] may have 5 minutes before the vote is taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia have 5 minutes to speak on the motion that the Committee do now rise. Is there objection?

Mr. O'KONSKI. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

The question was taken; and the Chair being in doubt, the Committee divided, and there were—ayes 99, noes 105.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. CANNON of Missouri and Mr. PACE to act as tellers.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 123, noes 111.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MAGNUSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 1605, had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, may I ask my friend from Massachusetts, the majority leader, if he can tell us the program for next week?

Mr. McCORMACK. I shall be very glad to do so.

Monday is Washington's Birthday, and there is no intention of having any legislative business on that day. It therefore follows that the bill (H. R. 1605) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act will go over until Tuesday.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. It is definitely established then that House bill 1605, with respect to farm acreage allotments, and so forth, which has just been laid aside, will come up again on Tuesday?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes. I think it is the only thing to do.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I think that is the fair way to proceed.

Mr. McCORMACK. On Thursday and Friday the first deficiency appropriation bill will be considered. I understand the probabilities are that Thursday will be devoted to general debate and on Friday the bill will be considered under the 5-minute rule.

Subject to the fact that on Thursday and Friday that appropriation bill will be considered, other business will be considered in the following order:

First, there will be the amendment to the Civilian Pilot Training Act of 1939, and that will follow the bill we have been considering today. Following that will be H. R. 1692, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, which I understand is an important bill. Following that will be the Columbia Basin project bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. When are we going to have before us the resolution creating a standing committee on aviation, in which a good many of us are interested?

Mr. McCORMACK. I cannot see where that can come up next week.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Of course, the gentleman realizes that after the resolution has been out 7 days any member of the committee has a right to call it up.

Mr. McCORMACK. The appropriation bill will be considered Thursday and Friday, and I cannot see where that resolution can be taken up next week. No delaying tactics are involved at all, because I have no reason for delaying it.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Let us carry this a little further. Suppose the lend-lease bill should be reported out of the committee, what will happen to that?

Mr. McCORMACK. Of course, everyone recognizes that the lend-lease bill is of paramount interest.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Perhaps the Committee on Ways and Means has something to bring up. I see the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] is here.

Mr. McCORMACK. That would have the right-of-way.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Which would have the right-of-way?

Mr. McCORMACK. The lend-lease bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. How about the bill increasing the debt limit?

Mr. McCORMACK. I have no official notice about the bill, except through the newspapers. The bill is before the Committee on Ways and Means. I am informed that it has been ordered reported. That bill is a very important one, too. So there is the lend-lease bill, the bill out of the Committee on Ways and Means, and the resolution from the Committee on Rules, which was reported a few days ago. The bills to which I have previously referred were announced as being on the program for this week, and inasmuch as Members are interested in these bills it is only fair that the order in which it was announced that they would come up be followed as nearly as possible. I cannot see that the resolution in connection with the creation of a new committee can be considered until the week after next.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I hope the gentleman will find that there will be time for it next week.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am sure that from my angle there is no tendency to delay, but as far as the first 2 or 3 days of next week are concerned, I may say that there has been no pressure on me from the Committee on Rules to have this resolution brought up Tuesday or Wednesday.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I have tried to put a little pressure on now from this side.

Mr. McCORMACK. The interest of my friend from Massachusetts is thoroughly appreciated. I will cooperate with him just as soon as I can.

Mr. BULWINKLE. If the gentleman will yield, may I say that I should like to put on some pressure the other way.

SELECTIVE TRAINING ACT

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Military Affairs has reported out my bill to amend the Selective Service and Training Act by providing the manner in which those with dependents would be called to the service.

I was very desirous of refuting some misleading statements which had been made by certain officials who opposed the bill.

Because of the lateness of the hour, I will not claim the time that has been allowed to me, but I now ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday next, after the disposition of the legislative business of the day and any other special orders heretofore entered, I may be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SENATE

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1943

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our fathers' God, Author of liberty, we come with sacramental remembrance that on this new day in the cycle of the passing year even the calendar makes obeisance at the shrine of patriotism. Out of the heroic yesterdays when founding fathers, pledging their lives, fortunes, and sacred honor, molded the Union comes an arresting voice: "Let us now praise famous men and our fathers that begat us; for the Lord manifested in them great glory, even His mighty power from the beginning."

In this city which is baptized in his revered name, where the monumental shaft lifts its glistening whiteness to the bending sky, telling to the generations following of the supremacy of unsullied character, we bow in this hallowed temple of the freedom he wrought to achieve, to give Thee thanks for the life and service of that one whom we reverently call the Father of his Country. We would clearly see that stately figure, fatherly yet stern, who having won all renounced all. As in the deep need of our Nation's cause we lift our hearts to Thee, especially would we remember that one who in the darkness and the doubt of an hour when all the lamps had gone out gained strength and solace for himself and for his tattered, suffering troops when, alone and apart, he found an altar for bended knee on the hard and frozen ground. May we honor him by being worthy of the favor of his God and our God, who hath made and preserved us a nation. Amen.

READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the standing order of the Senate of January 24, 1901, Washington's Farewell Address will now be read by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN], who has heretofore been designated to perform that duty.

Mr. MILLIKIN advanced to the desk and read the Farewell Address, as follows:

To the people of the United States:

FRIENDS AND FELLOW CITIZENS: The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those, out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you, at the same time, to do me the justice to be assured, that this resolution has not been taken, without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that, in withdrawing the tender of service which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest; no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness; but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of, and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me, have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty, and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this, previous to the last election, had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations, and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence, impelled me to abandon the idea.

I rejoice that the state of your concerns, external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety; and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country, you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust, were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust, I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed towards the organization and administration of the government, the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset, of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience, in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and, every day, the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more, that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that, while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is to terminate the career of my political life, my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country, for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me; and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment, by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise, and as an instructive example in our annals, that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead amidst appearances sometimes dubious, vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging—in situations in which not unfrequently, want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism,—the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts, and a guarantee of the plans, by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave, as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence—that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual—that the free constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained—that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue—that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these states, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation, and so prudent a use of this blessing, as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare, which cannot end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger, natural to that solicitude, urge me, on an occasion like the present, to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review, some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom, as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget, as an encouragement to it, your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquillity at home; your peace abroad; of your safety; of your prosperity; of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But as it is easy to foresee that, from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed; it is of infinite moment, that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can, in any event, be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth, or choice, of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism, more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have, in a common cause, fought and triumphed together; the independence and liberty you possess, are the work of joint counsels, and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, ar greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest.—Here, every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The north, in an unrestrained intercourse with the south, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter, great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise, and precious materials of manufacturing industry.—The south, in the same intercourse, benefiting by the same agency of the north, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the north, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes, in different ways, to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength, to which itself is unequally adapted. The east, in a like intercourse with the west, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communications by land and water, will more and more find a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad, or manufactures at home. The west derives from the east supplies requisite to its growth and comfort—and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions, to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one nation. Any other tenure by which the west can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength; or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While then every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined cannot fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts, greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations; and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union, an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves, which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same government; which their own rivalship alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances; attachments, and intrigues, would stimulate and embitter. Hence likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments, which under any form of government are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is, that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind and exhibit the continuance of the union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union, affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who, in any quarter, may endeavor to weaken its hands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations,—northern and southern—Atlantic and western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart burnings which spring from these misrepresentations; they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head; they have seen, in the negotiation by the executive, and in the unanimous ratification by the senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at the event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the general government and in the Atlantic states, unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties, that with Great Britain and that with Spain, which secure to them everything they could desire, in respect to our foreign relations, towards confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such they are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your Union, a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute; they must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances, in all times, have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay, by the adoption of a constitution of government, better calculated than your former, for an intimate union, and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and maintaining within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government.—But the constitution which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power, and the right of the people to establish government, presuppose the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberations and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency.—They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force, to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation the will of party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community; and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men, will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government; destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Towards the preservation of your government and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular opposition to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretext. One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system; and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments, as of other human institutions:—that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country:—that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion, exposes to perpetual change from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion: and remember, especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours, a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name, where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the state, with particular references to the founding them on geographical discrimination. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind.—It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism.—But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result, gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and, sooner or later, the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purpose of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind, (which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight) the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils, and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foments occasional riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which finds a facilitated access to the government itself through the channels of party passions. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true; and in governments of a monarchial cast, patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency, it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. And there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent it bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming, it should consume.

It is important likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions of the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern; some of them in our country and under our own eyes.—To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the constitution designates.—But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism, who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? and let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect, that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

It is substantially true, that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric?

Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering, also, that timely disbursements, to prepare for danger, frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions, in time of peace, to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should cooperate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty, it is essential that you should practically bear in mind, that towards the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes, that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper object (which is always a choice of difficulties,) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue, which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice towards all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt but, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it; can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan, nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others, should be excluded; and that, in place of them, just and amicable feelings towards all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges towards another an habitual hatred, or an habitual fondness, is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. Hence, frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation, prompted by ill will and resentment, sometimes impels to war the government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times, it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty of nations, has been the victim.

So likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducements or justifications. It leads also to concessions, to the favorite nation, of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions, by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted or deluded citizens who devote themselves to the favorite nation, facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils!—Such an attachment of a small or weak, towards a great and powerful nation, dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, (I conjure you to believe me fellow citizens,) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove, that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another, cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odious; while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith:—Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence, she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collusions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation, when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliance with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maximum no less applicable to public than private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat it, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But in my opinion, it is unnecessary, and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments, on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, and a liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand: neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary, and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view, that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance, it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect, or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish; that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations, but if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism; this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far, in the discharge of my official duties, I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated, the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is, that I have, at least, believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe; my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both houses of congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take, and was bound, in duty and interest, to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverance and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct, it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without any thing more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity towards other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress, without interruption, to that degree of strength, and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration, I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence; and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service, with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love towards it, which is so natural to a man who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations; I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize without alloy, the sweet enjoyment of partaking, in the midst of my fellow citizens, the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors, and dangers.

The bill has been on the calendar for 2 or 3 weeks, and I wish to seek action on it.

NOMINATION AND CONFIRMATION OF GOVERNMENTAL EMPLOYEES RECEIVING COMPENSATION OF $4,500 PER ANNUM OR MORE

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, February 19, 1943.

The Honorable the VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES and PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: My attention has been called to the provisions of S. 575. I desire to express my unqualified opposition to this proposed legislation.

The proposal for Presidential nomination and Senate confirmation of all employees receiving more than $4,500 per annum presupposes congressional responsibility for the operations of executive agencies. An agency head is responsible for the success or failure of his program. This accountability is dissipated if responsibility for the appointment of employees is divided.

Under our form of government the appointment of those officers who, in a fundamental sense, determine policy has generally been subject to Senate confirmation. But determination of policy is not synonymous with the exercise of administrative discretion. Neither does it include work performed by the vast number of technical and scientific personnel who occupy positions which fall above a salary figure of $4,500 or any other arbitrary amount.

The practice of the Federal Government with respect to the selection and appointment of non-policy-determining employees has evolved over a period of 60 years. This development culminated in the passage of the Ramspeck Act of 1940 requiring the appointment of practically all such employees on the basis of merit under the Civil Service Act. To turn the clock back by reversing this decision would be folly in time of peace. In war it would be little less than tragic.

Equally important are the practical considerations which make this bill undesirable. More than 33,000 positions would be subject to Presidential nomination and Senate confirmation under the terms of the proposed legislation. I do not have the time personally to examine the qualifications of the individuals whose appointments would in such circumstances have to be approved by me. It is equally evident that the Congress does not have the time. Senate confirmation would either become a rubber-stamp process or a task of such magnitude as to leave little time for the conduct of legislative business and to delay appointments to essential war jobs.

The experience with confirmation of War Manpower Commission appointments as required by its appropriation act is significant. On January 11, 1943, 30 names were nominated to the Senate. No action was taken until February 15, when 21 names were confirmed and 1 was sent back to the committee. At the present time, almost 6 weeks after the submission of the nominations, action still remains to be taken in 8 cases. If the proposed bill is enacted into law, with the inevitable multiplication of delays of this character, the American people will not fail to realize that it is the legislative branch of the Government that is thus holding up vigorous prosecution of the war program.

This bill, if enacted into law, would also adversely affect the recruitment of persons for key positions. It would lay all of us open to the charge that we are playing politics with the war program. We cannot permit confidence in the Government to be undermined in this manner. Neither can we afford to add the obstacle of Senate confirmation to other difficulties which confront us in our efforts to secure the best talent of the Nation for the Government service.

During the past 2½ years, in the face of a steadily dwindling reserve of manpower, the Government service has expanded from less than 1,000,000 employees to approximately 3,000,000. Undoubtedly in view of the large numbers involved, the limited supply, and the speed required, mistakes have been made. Corrective steps have been taken and will continue to be taken to eliminate abuses and to strengthen the machinery for the application of the merit principle to the recruitment, advancement, and removal of employees.

In our zeal to correct mistakes, however, we should not make the error of undermining the entire administrative structure that has been erected for the conduct of the war. Confirmation of administrative, professional, and technical employees by a legislative body is the very antithesis of the merit system and would sweep away years of civil-service progress.

For these reasons I urge that this bill not be enacted into law.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Mr. McKELLAR subsequently said: Mr. President, I understand that earlier in the day the Vice President placed in the RECORD a letter addressed to him by the President of the United States concerning a bill recently introduced by me providing for the confirmation of certain officials.

Saturday I gave out a statement to the newspapers in answer to the letter of the President, urging the early enactment of my bill requiring Senate confirmation of all Government employees receiving $4,500 or more per annum. I ask unanimous consent that the statement be printed immediately following the letter placed in the RECORD by the Vice President.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senator McKELLAR declared:

"In no place does the Constitution say that only policy-determining officials shall be confirmed by the Senate. The Constitution says 'all officers.'

"But let us see about policy-determining officials. My good friend Jimmie Byrnes is a policy-determining officer. So is Harry Hopkins. So is Nelson Rockefeller, Mr. Stettinius, Mr. Jeffers, James M. Landis, Elmer Davis, Donald Nelson, Paul V. McNutt as Manpower Chairman, and Vice President Wallace as head of the Board of Economic Warfare.

"These are 10 of the most important policy-determining officials of the Government, and surely they were not confirmed, as everybody admits is required by the Constitution.

"Members of the Cabinet were confirmed by the Senate, but surely no one could claim that even members of the Cabinet have greater power for determining policies than these gentlemen above named. I should think, off-hand, that these 10 gentlemen are very excellent examples of policy-determining officials, none of whom has been confirmed by the Senate, as I recall.

"This bill does not interfere with the Civil Service Act or the employees under it, except as an additional precaution it requires confirmation as provided by the Constitution.

"The next argument is the time it would take the President and Congress to appoint these officers. A complete answer to that argument is the entirely effective and successful way of appointing all of the permanent officers of the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, and the Post Office.

"These appointments take little time of the President or the Senate, and I think everyone will concede that we get the best material in this method of appointment. Who will say that our Army officers, our Navy officers, our Marine Corps officers, and our postmasters are not of the very best classes of officers in our Government.

"There have been over 100,000 officers appointed and confirmed during the present administration without any delay worth mentioning.

"There is no politics in this bill. Its purpose is simply to follow the tried, proved, and constitutional way, the American way, of appointing officials of the Government.

"Mention is made of the scarcity of manpower. If appointments were made in the constitutional way, it is exceedingly doubtful if it would be necessary to have 3,000,000 persons working for the Government. If this bill is passed, I doubt if manpower would be so scarce.

"One of the purposes of this bill is to see how many of this vast increase from 1,000,000 to 3,000,000 employees are really necessary.

"It is not a question of correcting mistakes. It is a question of standing by the Constitution that has made us great. It is a question of Americanism.

"I have the very greatest respect for the opinions of our great President, but, with that great respect, I still think that S. 575 should become the law at the earliest possible moment, and I hope the President will reconsider his letter to our distinguished Vice President and sign the bill if it should be passed."

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

A letter in the nature of a memorial from Moose Lake State Hospital Employees, Local No. 488, American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees, of Moose Lake, Minn., remonstrating against the enactment of the so-called McKellar bill, relating to confirmation by the Senate of governmental employees receiving compensation of $4,500 or more per annum; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A resolution adopted by the Santa Monica Bay Parlor, No. 267, Native Sons of the Golden West, Santa Monica, Calif., protesting against the formation and enrollment of a Japanese unit of the United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Idaho; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"Senate Joint Memorial 4

"To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States Government in Congress assembled:

"We, your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Idaho, do respectfully represent that—

"Whereas the residents of the State of Idaho are anxious to assist in every possible way in winning the war and are willing to face obstacles of all types; and

"Whereas the tire-rationing program and restrictions on the use of rubber are seriously crippling the production of food and disrupting vitally needed transportation; and

"Whereas the need for prompt development of synthetic rubber is most urgent to promote the successful prosecution of the war effort and alleviate the restrictions now required on travel facilities; and

"Whereas vast supplies of raw products from farm and forest are available for producing synthetic rubber of high quality by known and proven processes: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the State of Idaho (the House of Representatives concurring), That we respectfully request that the Congress of the United States of America give the matter of development of synthetic rubber its immediate attention and aid in every possible way the development of the manufacture of synthetic rubber. We further respectfully urge that restrictions now in effect by any and all agencies of the Government, preventing an immediate development of synthetic rubber from any and all sources, be removed by congressional action; and be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Idaho be authorized, and he is hereby directed, to immediately forward a certified copy of this memorial to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State."

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, favoring an immediate investigation by the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of all the agricultural "musts," to the end that the requirements of sufficient manpower, sufficient current credit, proper price relationship between production costs, ceilings and floors, sufficient farm machinery and repair parts, gasoline, rubber, fertilizer and other necessary supplies be definitely determined on a long-time basis, etc., so that sufficient food and fiber may be forthcoming to meet increasingly expanding goals and to supply all requirements; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

(See memorial printed in full when presented by Mr. LANGER on the 18th instant, at p. 1083 of the RECORD.)

By Mr. CAPPER:

A petition signed by members of the woman's division of the Christian Service of the Oxford (Kans.) Methodist Church, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale and distribution of alcoholic liquors in the vicinity of military camps and naval establishments; ordered to lie on the table.

By Mr. GILLETTE:

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

"Senate Concurrent Resolution L

"A concurrent resolution memorializing Congress and the President to take immediate steps toward production of synthetic rubber from farm products

"Whereas our supply of natural crude rubber has been cut off almost entirely by one of our enemies in this Second World War, thus very seriously interfering with the mobility of our commerce and industrial and agricultural efficiency, our modern way of life, and the successful prosecution of this war; and

"Whereas scientific research has proven beyond the experimental stage that a good quality of synthetic rubber can be made from various agricultural and forest products with less of vital war materials and with greater speed than from petroleum, which is very rapidly nearing depletion; and

"Whereas the American farmer now needs rubber more than ever before, because of scarcity of help and essential time saving in order for him to meet most certainly the tremendous needs of our armed forces and those of our allies, which our Washington authorities are expecting, and which needs the American farmer is patriotically, loyally, and cheerfully ready to supply to the best of his ability; and

"Whereas the patriotic hearings by the subcommittee of the United States Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as conducted by Senators Gillette, Wheeler, Thomas of Oklahoma, McNary, and Norris on the investigation relative to the production of industrial alcohol, synthetic alcohol, and synthetic rubber from farm crops, proved the feasibility and practicability of using farm crops as the source of the above-named alcohols and rubber; and

"Whereas said investigation further proves that the use of $650,000,000 of Reconstruction Finance Corporation funds have been authorized by Secretary Jesse Jones to a few of the large petroleum companies for the ostensible purpose of manufacturing 700,000 tons of Buna-s synthetic rubber from the quickest, least-costly way, 200,000 from alcohol; and

"Whereas the use of farm crops for the manufacture of alcohol and synthetic rubber would furnish a cheap source of rubber and tend to stabilize the Nation's most essential industry and its buying power in our national economy, and yet it was ignored in this Nation's great war effort to defeat the world's Fascist dictators and again reassure man's freedom; and

"Whereas it is not just now that the American farmers are beginning to sacrifice, but rather they have had this experience throughout most of the past post-war period in producing this Nation's food and fiber almost always below the cost of production, thereby resulting in the loss of farm homes; and furthermore the work of the farmer has been from 12 to 16 hours, and now in the Nation's greatest emergency his best trained and skilled help—his sons—have been conscripted, thus reducing seriously his ability to meet the food requirements of our people, our men in uniform, and our allies, and when he needs rubber for his most effective work in the Nation's peril, he witnesses these same petroleum interests, that have been given the $65,000,000, dilly-dallying and stalling in meeting this Nation's extremely critical rubber needs: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Twenty-eighth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota, That we demand of the United States Congress and the President of the United States that steps be taken immediately toward the production of the all-essential rubber from farm products for war and domestic uses; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, the Vice President, Henry A. Wallace, and the Senators and Representatives from the States of North Dakota, Minnesota, Nebraska, Kansas, Oregon, Montana, Missouri, Iowa, Oklahoma, and North Dakota, requesting them to renew the determined fight to make rubber out of farm crops."

By Mr. GILLETTE (for himself and Mr. WILSON):

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

"House Concurrent Resolution 17

"Whereas daylight working hours are a vital factor in the preparation and harvesting of crops, the feeding of farm animals, and the production of all farm commodities; and

"Whereas the new war time known as daylight-saving time since its establishment has proved to be wasteful, rather than time-saving; and

"Whereas in these days of dire need every possible hour on the farm must be used for the production of vital foods; and

"Whereas the factories engaged in war production are largely on a 24-hour-per-day basis and those not thus engaged are largely on a short-day basis of work; and

"Whereas because of these conditions this change in time has not resulted in the saving of electric power and fuel; Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the house (the senate concurring), That we respectfully petition Congress of the United States to repeal the act known as "daylight-saving time," chapter 7, second session, Public Law 403, Seventy-seventh Congress (S. 2160) which was approved by Congress January 20, 1942, and which establishes a standard time for the United States 1 hour earlier than mean astronomical time, and by this repeal permit agriculture to operate with a greater degree of efficiency; be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the two Iowa Senators and the eight Iowa Members of the House of Representatives, and that they be thus petitioned to use all their influence and best offices that this change in time may be made and put into effect before the heavy farm-work season begins."

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa; to the Committee on Commerce:

"Senate Concurrent Resolution 16

"Whereas the Congress of the United States has before it for consideration House bill 1012 and Senate bill 246 affecting air commerce; and

"Whereas air commerce (air lines) represents a minor part of civil aviation, and private flying and fixed base operations represent a major part of civil aviation whose operations are not interstate in character and therefore are of no concern of the Federal Government, the pending legislation would deny to the States their inherent rights to govern within their own State and would seriously jeopardize private flying and fixed base operations; and

"Whereas by applying the intent of this legislation to other forms of transportation our national economy would be seriously affected; and

"Whereas there is no immediate need for this legislation as the President of the United States is vested with full power under the Defense Act to regulate all aircraft, civilian or otherwise, if necessary; and

"Whereas those men who are serving their country in the various branches of service are unable to voice their sentiments or opinions on this proposed legislation at this time, and they are the persons who have contributed more to the development of aviation and are entitled to their place in aeronautics when and if they return from active duty; and

"Whereas there is ample time for such legislation to be considered in the future since consideration has not been given future developments and improvements which will change methods now used in the regulation of aircraft: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the State Legislature of Iowa respectfully requests that no action be taken on the above-mentioned bills or any similar bill or bills by Congress until the present war is over and peace is established; be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the clerk of the United States Senate, the Clerk of the United States House of Representatives, the clerk of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of Congress, and to each of the Iowa Senators and Representatives in Congress."

(The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution identical with the foregoing, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.)

Two concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Iowa; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"Senate Concurrent Resolution 8

"Whereas stock feeders in Iowa are finding it difficult and in many cases impossible to obtain oil meal, cottonseed meal, soybean meal, tankage and similar feeds so necessary in the feeding and finishing livestock for market; and

"Whereas where available these must generally be purchased if at all at increasingly exorbitant prices in mixtures and compounds generally known as commercial stock foods; and

"Whereas the difficulty in obtaining these necessary feed substances, at reasonable prices in the usual forms, is seriously slowing down and discouraging the production of meat so necessary to the war effort; and

"Whereas it is being commonly asserted and believed that this situation does not arise from an actual shortage of these products so much as by manipulation and preferences which might be prevented and removed by national authority: Be it therefore

"Resolved by the Senate of the State of Iowa (the house of representatives concurring), That we call upon the Congress of the United States to institute such investigation of this subject as may be necessary to determine the fact and fix blame, if any, and pass legislation, if any is required, to correct the situation complained of; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the Secretary of Agriculture and to each member of the Iowa Delegation in Congress."

---

"House Concurrent Resolution 13

"Whereas this Nation is now engaged in a world-wide war which has brought about a tremendous demand upon our transportation facilities; and

"Whereas it is recognized that a serious problem has arisen relative to the continuation of our transportation facilities because of the shortage of rubber, and our Government has urged, as a result of investigations and conclusions reached by the Baruch committee, a development of synthetic rubber to alleviate the shortage; and

"Whereas it is a desire of this State to cooperate in every way possible with the Federal Government and its committees and to make available its surplus commodities which are essential in the manufacture of synthetic rubber; and

"Whereas in the State of Iowa raw materials are available for the manufacture of alcohol used in the production of synthetic rubber; and

"Whereas, it would be economically advantageous to erect factories for the production of synthetic rubber in the area where protein byproducts are urgently needed for animal feeds: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the house (the senate concurring), That Rubber Administrator William

M. Jeffers and our two Senators, Hon. GEORGE A. WILSON and Hon. GUY M. GILLETTE, and our eight Congressmen be urged to use their best efforts to help unsnarl the present situation relative to the production of synthetic rubber from agricultural products; that such plants be located in the surplus-crop area, including the State of Iowa, to the end that our State, Nation, and humanity be benefited and also to the end that this war be brought to a successful and more rapid conclusion; be it further Resolved by the house, That copies of this resolution be mailed to Vice President Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture Claude R. Wickard, Rubber Administrator William M. Jeffers, Senator Guy M. Gillette, Senator George A. Wilson, and our eight Members of the House of Representatives and that this resolution be spread upon the House and Senate Journals of the Fiftieth General Assembly of the State of Iowa."

By Mr. BUSHFIELD:

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of South Dakota; to the Committee on Military Affairs:

"House Concurrent Resolution 3

"Concurrent resolution memorializing the War Production Board of the United States to release sufficient supplies of metallic ammunition and shot shells to permit farmers and stockmen to keep predatory animals under control and to permit hunters to adequately harvest surplus crops of game birds and game animals for food during the period of the war emergency

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of South Dakota (the senate concurring therein):

"Whereas predatory animals, such as wolves and coyotes, have increased to an alarming extent in recent years; and

"Whereas if such animals are not kept under control, tremendous damage results to flocks of sheep and poultry; and

"Whereas surplus crops of game birds and game animals constitute a tremendous potential supply of food which can be made available to the people of South Dakota only if the same can be harvested by hunting; and

"Whereas the supply of shot shells and metallic ammunition in the State of South Dakota is not sufficient at the present time to provide an adequate supply to control predatory animals and game birds; and

"Whereas ring-neck pheasants have increased to the extent that they are a nuisance and are doing considerable damage to grain and forage crops; and

"Whereas migratory waterfowl, during their fall migration period, feed in large numbers in South Dakota grain fields and can do extensive damage to such fields if not kept under control; and

"Whereas it will be an economic waste of very valuable food resources if surplus game crops cannot be adequately harvested due to a lack of sporting ammunition: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of South Dakota (the senate concurring), That we earnestly recommend to the War Production Board of the United States that they release a sufficient supply of metallic ammunition and shot shells to permit farmers and stockmen to keep predatory animals under control and to permit hunters to harvest the surplus game crop in South Dakota during the war emergency; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to each Member of Congress from South Dakota, including both Senators and Representatives, and to the War Production Board of the United States, with the request that this matter receive their most earnest consideration."

By Mr. HATCH (for himself and Mr. CHAVEZ):

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of New Mexico; to the Committee on Appropriations:

"House Joint Memorial 7

"Joint memorial memorializing the Congress of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture for an appropriation to combat grasshoppers and other insect plagues

"Whereas the State of New Mexico is from time to time greatly damaged by grasshoppers and other insect plagues which destroy crops and damage pasture land; and

"Whereas it is necessary for the general welfare of the State of New Mexico and the welfare of the people of the United States that such grasshopper and insect plagues be combated; and

"Whereas, if money is not appropriated in order that such grasshopper and insect plagues may be scientifically combated, there may be a large decrease in various agricultural crops in the State of New Mexico; and

"Whereas, if money is not appropriated to scientifically combat grasshoppers and other insect plagues, the pastures of this State may be seriously damaged, resulting in an impairment of the livestock products of this State; and

"Whereas, it is necessary for effectual conduct of the present great war effort that a maximum production be attained in all agricultural pursuits of this State: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, The Sixteenth Legislature of New Mexico does hereby request the Congress of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture, be and they are memorialized and petitioned to provide funds to the State of New Mexico in order that grasshoppers and other insect plagues will be effectively combated; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this memorial be sent to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of the Interior, and to the Senators and Representatives of New Mexico in Congress."

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of New Mexico; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation:

"Senate Joint Resolution 9

"Joint resolution setting forth the policy of the State of New Mexico regarding the respective rights and powers of the Federal and State Governments to control and administer the uses of the waters within the State of New Mexico, and establishing a policy to promote joint action by the States and the United States in the efficient use of water and the control of flood waters to the end that litigation be avoided and the use and control of water be continued in the manner and under the laws as heretofore exercised

"Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of New Mexico:

"Whereas in the State of New Mexico there are rights of immense proportion which have been acquired in reliance upon State laws governing the use of water, and there are many enterprises awaiting development, which is possible only through the use of water; and

"Whereas differences of opinion have arisen regarding the respective rights and powers of the Federal and State Governments to control and administer the use of waters within the several States, with the result that the stability of existing property rights and the future development of the water resources of this State are threatened and doubt is cast upon the authority of this State to exercise control over such use; and

"Whereas in order to remove all causes, present and future, which might lead to litigation, the welfare of this State requires that action be taken to insure interstate comity in the use of water, and to promote joint action by the States and the United States in the efficient use of water and the control of flood waters to the end that litigation be avoided and the use and control of water be continued in the manner and under the laws as heretofore exercised: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That it is the policy of the State of New Mexico to maintain its jurisdiction and control over the rights to the use of the waters in this State, and to protect such rights as have been established under the laws thereof; be it further

"Resolved, That it is the policy of this State to protect rights to the beneficial use of water within this State as against threatened uses outside of the State; be it further

"Resolved, That it is the policy of this State to promote harmonious relations with the United States and with other States in respect to the beneficial use of water, and to encourage the making of compacts with respect to such relationship; be it further

"Resolved, That in furtherance of these policies, the Governor shall direct the Interstate Stream Commission to perform such duties as may be necessary to carry these policies into effect; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State."

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of New Mexico; to the Committee on Mines and Mining:

"Senate Joint Resolution 7

"Joint resolution relating to the potash industry, requesting Congress to take proper steps looking to its protection

"Whereas in the First World War, because of control of then existing mineral potash resources by enemy countries, notably Germany, the United States was deprived of this essential industrial and agricultural chemical, and despite the expenditure of vast sums of money in efforts to produce potash from inferior and uneconomic sources, only small amounts could be made available; and

"Whereas, determined that such scarcity of a chemical vital in peace and war should not occur again, the United States Government and private enterprise conducted wide explorations for a permanent supply of potash, which resulted in the discovery and development of the New Mexico field, where, from three mines, potassic ores are removed to refineries for concentration and thence shipped to all parts of this country and to Canada and to Cuba; and

"Whereas American potash production for the most part is from the public domain and State-owned lands, under leases supervised by Federal and State technicians, thus assuring maintenance of high conservation and safety standards; and

"Whereas all the requirements of the United States for potash are now fully met by American mines and refineries, employing in New Mexico and other Western States several thousand workers, who, with their families and business and professional enterprises serving them, comprise thriving communities of permanent importance to the West; and

"Whereas foreign supplies of potash constitute a menace to these communities and to the American potash industries, unless some effective measure of import control is established by law: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of New Mexico requests the Seventy-eighth Congress of the United States in its present session to give consideration in appropriate legislative measures to methods of controlling potash imports into the United States and its possessions at the close of the war, to the end that the American potash industries shall survive, thus assuring continuance of their operations and the preservation of the welfare of their workers and the communities dependent on them; be it further

"Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Honorable CARL A. HATCH, the Honorable DENNIS CHAVEZ, the Honorable CLINTON P. ANDERSON, and the Honorable A. M. FERNANDEZ, New Mexico representatives in the Congress of the United States, and to the Honorable JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, chairman of the Mineral Resources Committee, a subcommittee of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys of the United States Senate."

A joint memorial and a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of New Mexico; to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

"Senate Joint Memorial 1

"Joint memorial memorializing the Congress of the United States of America and the Office of Price Administration to relieve dairymen and the dairy industry in New Mexico by raising the ceiling price on fluid milk or lowering the ceiling price on feed used in the dairy industry

"Whereas the dairy industry is one of the most important industries in New Mexico both from an economic standpoint and from the standpoint of production of essential food products needed for assistance in the war effort; and

"Whereas the prevailing ceiling price set by the Office of Price Administration upon fluid milk is too low to allow dairymen to pay the expenses of production and have a reasonable margin of profit; and

"Whereas the prevailing ceiling price fixed by said agency of the Government upon livestock feeds is too high to enable dairymen to feed their herds and produce fluid milk with a reasonable margin of profit; and

"Whereas the dairy industry in New Mexico has been seriously injured and jeopardized by the prevailing ceiling prices on fluid milk and livestock feed, and grave danger exists that many dairy businesses will be forced to discontinue business as a result thereof; and

"Whereas dire food shortages in New Mexico would immediately result from enforced discontinuance of the business of dairying by any considerable number of dairies, resulting in hardship and deprivation for babies and children and other needy persons in this State; and

"Whereas the dairy industry can be encouraged to continue in business by (1) raising the ceiling price on fluid milk to an amount sufficient to enable the business to receive a reasonable profit on its products, or (2) lowering the ceiling price on livestock feeds to be used in the dairying business, sufficiently to accomplish the same purpose; and

"Whereas the government of the State of New Mexico is without power and authority to accomplish the desired result: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Legislature of the State of New Mexico, That the Congress of the United States and the Office of Price Administration be, and they are memorialized, petitioned, and requested to take such action as may be necessary to raise the ceiling price on fluid milk, or lower the ceiling price on livestock feeds used in the dairy business, to protect and encourage continuance of the dairy business in New Mexico by allowing such business a reasonable profit for engaging in such business; be it further

"Resolved, That engrossed copies of this memorial be mailed forthwith by the proper officials to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from New Mexico, and to the Office of Price Administration in Washington, D. C., and the State Director of the Office of Price Administration in New Mexico."

"House Joint Resolution 18

"Joint resolution relating to the ceiling prices on livestock and farm products

"Whereas the stock growers and farmers are urgently requested to increase their production of livestock and farm products, to meet the demands of the military services, of the lend-lease operations of the Government and of home consumption; and

"Whereas unless this request is met, there is the possibility of there being a shortage of food supplies for home consumption; and

"Whereas the cost of labor and of necessary equipment and machinery has greatly increased, and owing to the competition of the various war industries, there is a shortage of farm labor, requiring labor for long hours on the part of the stock grower, the farmer, and the members of their families: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of New Mexico respectfully petitions that the Congress of the United States require that in the fixing of ceiling prices of livestock and of farm products, the increased cost of labor and materials be given full consideration and that likewise, in fixing such prices, the value of the long hours of labor of the stock grower, the farmer and their families be also taken into consideration; and be it further

"Resolved, That certified copies of this joint resolution be sent to the Senators and Members of Congress from New Mexico."

Two joint memorials and a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of New Mexico; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys:

"Senate Joint Memorial 3

"Joint memorial, memorializing Congress and its Senate Committee on Public Lands and Surveys and the House Committee on Public Lands of the urgent need for grazing privileges among the small livestock men in certain counties in New Mexico

"Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of New Mexico:

"Whereas the State of New Mexico has for years supplied a livelihood to many inhabitants thereof by providing grazing privileges in an unlimited way to all livestock men, within its borders; and

"Whereas the main industry of the State of New Mexico has been the raising and caring for livestock therein, profitably and gainfully, up to and including the year 1932; and

"Whereas during the last few years, grazing privileges which were available have been limited as a result of tax sales or other form of transfer of existing community land grants, particularly in the counties of Mora, Taos, Rio Arriba, and Sandoval, thus diminishing the grazing privileges necessary for maintaining the high quality and feasibility of ownership of livestock; and

"Whereas the Government of the United States has seen fit and duly proper to engage in the purchase of these community land grants from private individuals for soil conservation purposes and the creation and establishment of national forests, particularly the Santa Fe National Forest embracing parts of Mora and Taos Counties, and the Carson National Forest embracing the counties of Mora, Taos, and Rio Arriba; and

"Whereas the said Government of the United States, in initiating practices of soil conservation and the establishment of national forests has limited the use of, and in some instances has entirely denied these grazing privileges so that many inhabitants have been forced to abandon the livestock industry because of those inadequate concessions and limitations thus causing these individuals in the above counties mentioned to apply for relief and confine their search for livelihood to the helping hand of their Federal Government; and

"Whereas to relieve poverty and to encourage and promote among these individuals, individual industry in a manner conducive to better living, it is deemed necessary to relax the soil conservation laws and promote more extensive grazing by small cattlemen in these federally owned community land grants: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the committees on public lands of both Houses of Congress, the Congressional Representatives of New Mexico, the Secretary of the United States Department of Agriculture, be informed of the condition that exists, and that they be requested to undertake official action to alleviate the depressing circumstances which exist by providing for an adequate system of conservation having in regard the above necessitous circumstances of residents formerly occupying these land grants herein above referred to, and comparing the detriments of relief with the advantages of conservation and make adjustments accordingly; be it further

"Resolved, That the Congress be requested to enact a law providing that these small land grants be used strictly by those individuals who carry on the livestock industry for a livelihood as distinguished from commercial enterprises and that steps be taken to harmonize present Government supervision and administration with better grazing concessions; be it further

"Resolved, That the United States Congress be informed of the desperate need for more federally owned grazing lands dedicated to the exclusive use of small stockmen; be it further

"Resolved, That an enrolled and engrossed copy of this memorial be mailed to the committees on public lands of both Houses of Congress, to the Secretary of the Department of Agriculture and to New Mexico's congressional delegation."

"House Joint Memorial 6

"Joint memorial memorializing Congress, its Senate Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, and the House Committee on Public Lands, of the urgent need for extending opportunities for the production of food for national emergency

"Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of New Mexico:

"Whereas because of the War Production Board having requisitioned the steel from the Boice City-Farley branch of the Santa Fe Railroad in Union County, N. Mex., the county lost $16,512.50 annually from its tax income, and $736,795 from the valuation of the county, and suffered irreparable disruption in the livestock business; and

"Whereas, by the purchase and retirement of 75,000 acres of land in Union County as a portion of the Tri-State Land Utilization Program another $2,250 annual tax income has been lost to Union County, and also has the livestock industry disrupted to that further extent in production; and

"Whereas this land is located in the best beef- and mutton-producing area in the State of New Mexico, and it will contribute a substantial amount of food to the national larder should this land be placed under beef production, as well as add materially to the resources of the county and State; and

"Whereas to relieve the poverty caused by the above facts, for relief to individuals, and as encouraging individual industry in a manner conducive to better living, and to promote livestock food production: Be it therefore

"Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands of both Houses of Congress, the congressional representation of New Mexico, the President of the United States, the Department of the Interior, the Department of Agriculture, and the National Food Administrator, be informed of the condition, and that they be requested to undertake official action to alleviate the circumstances which exist by regulation, proclamation, or legislation, as may be necessary, by restoring the 75,000 acres of land in Union County, N. Mex., now under the Tri-State Land Utilization set-up by sale to individuals; be it further

"Resolved, That such sales be carried out in small grants so that no one person may acquire more than four sections, and to be used strictly by individuals who carry on the livestock industry for a livelihood as distinguished from commercial or speculative enterprises; be it further

"Resolved, That such grants or sales be made at prices commensurate with other publicly owned lands similarly situated, on the amortization plan, extending over a period of 30 years, with interest at 3 percent on deferred payments."

"House Joint Resolution 20

"Joint memorial petitioning the Congress of the United States to authorize and require the proper authorities to adopt a more liberal policy toward white settlers using Government lands under permits, to permit an increase of livestock on the national forests, and to open soil-conservation districts for grazing additional stock during the war emergency

"Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of New Mexico:

"Whereas within the limits of the State of New Mexico there exist vast areas of grazing land, owned and controlled by the Federal Government, as national forest land, lands administered under the Taylor Grazing Act, and land embraced in soil-conservation districts, on all of which grazing of livestock by settlers of the State has been reduced to a minimum, in line with a general policy of the conservation of the range, which was adopted under peacetime conditions; and

"Whereas our Nation is now at war and the country is facing a serious meat shortage, by reason of the extraordinary demands of our armed forces, as well as of those of our allies, and of the peoples of the Allied countries, and it is our belief that we should all make every effort to increase our meat supply; and

"Whereas it is our belief that an increase in the number of stock grazing on the said Federal-owned lands can be permitted for a few years without any permanent damages to the range, and if such increase be allowed, it will result in a very considerable increase in meats produced and marketed in this State; Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Legislature of the State of New Mexico, That it is the sense of the legislature, now in session, and representing the people of this State, that the Congress should speedily enact such appropriate legislation as to authorize and direct that the various agencies of the Federal Government having in charge the control of grazing on Federal-owned lands in New Mexico, permit a substantial increase in the number of livestock to be grazed on said lands for the duration of the war emergency, in the interest of the people of this State and of the Nation as a whole; and be it further

PAY-AS-YOU-GO TAX PLAN—RESOLUTION OF CONNECTICUT GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, for my colleague the distinguished junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] and myself I present herewith for appropriate reference a petition in the form of a resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Connecticut entitled "Resolution Memorializing Congress Concerning the Pay-As-You-Go Tax Plan."

Mr. President, I should like to say, for myself, that I am among the many who favor the pay-as-you-go tax policy, and I wish further to say that I believe in the withholding feature in the collection of taxes.

Mr. President, if I were compelled to write a tax bill today, I would adopt the principle of the so-called Ruml plan, with the proviso that we would collect from the taxpayers of the country whichever was the higher of the 1942 or the 1943 taxes.

I realize, more particularly just after having again heard the Farewell Address of the Father of his Country, that one cannot see so far into the future as he would like, and, after hearing from the Finance Committee, when its studies are completed, I may change my views, but, as of now, I am among those who believe in the principle of the so-called Ruml plan.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I wish to thank my colleague for his courtesy and cooperation in presenting, in behalf of both of us, a resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Connecticut. I might remark that when the 1942 tax bill was before the Finance Committee its very able chairman, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], appointed a subcommittee consisting of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], and myself to investigate and report back to the full committee the merits of the Ruml plan. At that time the subcommittee filed a unanimous report favorable to the adoption of the Ruml plan, but, so far as I presently recall, the only votes for its adoption in the full committee were those which reflected the views of the subcommittee, who, apparently, at that time were the ones who knew most about it.

The joint resolution of the General Assembly of Connecticut was referred to the Committee on Finance, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE, STATE OF CONNECTICUT,
Hartford, February 17, 1943.

Hon. FRANCIS T. MALONEY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR MALONEY: The following senate joint resolution was passed by this assembly on this date:

"Resolution memorializing Congress concerning the pay-as-you-go tax plan

"Resolved by this assembly, That we respectfully urge our Senators and Representatives in Congress to assist in the passage of a pay-as-you-go tax plan; and be it further

"Resolved, That the clerk of the senate and the clerk of the house of representatives be directed to forward a copy of this resolution to each of the Senators and Representatives for Connecticut in Congress and a copy to the Honorable ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, chairman of the House Committee on Ways and Means."

Very truly yours,

CLARENCE F. BALDWIN,
Clerk of the Senate.
SEARLS DEARINGTON,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

PRODUCTION OF ALCOHOL FROM AGRICULTURAL OR FOREST PRODUCTS—RESOLUTION OF NORTH DAKOTA LEGISLATURE

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, on behalf of my colleague the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] and myself, I present Senate concurrent resolution D of the Legislative Assembly of North Dakota memorializing Congress to enact legislation providing for the production of alcohol from agricultural or forest products, and ask that it be appropriately referred and printed in the RECORD.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution D

Concurrent resolution memorializing Congress to enact legislation providing for the production of alcohol from agricultural or forest products

Whereas our Nation is engaged in a death struggle with the Axis powers for the preservation of our form of Government and the American institutions; and

Whereas patriotism demands that every private consideration should be set aside to the end that the prosecution of the war may be carried to a successful conclusion; and

Whereas, it is incumbent upon private citizens as well as upon corporations and associations to do everything possible to provide the materials necessary to win the war at the earliest possible date; and

Whereas rubber is one of the necessary materials of vital importance in the prosecution of the war; and

Whereas investigation has demonstrated that there will be a shortage of nearly 500,000 tons in 1943 and more than 1,000,000 tons shortage in 1944; and

Whereas it has further been demonstrated that alcohol necessary in the production of rubber can be obtained by processing agricultural and forest products, of which we have an abundance, and that the setting-up of plants and machinery of sufficient capacity for production of rubber on a large scale can be ready for operation within 6 or 8 months at an expense much less than production from oil processes; and

Whereas facts abundantly show that very little rubber can be produced from oil processes in 1943 and 1944; and

Whereas any unnecessary delay in the production of this vital war material will result in prolongation of the war, the sacrifice of thousands of our young men in the armed forces of the United States, and the destruction of countless millions of property; and

Whereas plants established during the emergency for processing such products for the manufacture of rubber would be of continued value in times of peace by utilizing surplus agricultural products and thus materially contribute to the economic stability of our Nation and aid in the rehabilitation of its citizens during the period of adjustment after the war; Now, therefore, be it

concurring), That we memorialize, petition, and urge Congress to take such steps as are necessary for the speedy enactment into law a bill providing for the manufacture of rubber and alcohol products from agricultural and forest products in order to expedite the prosecution of the war and providing an increased supply of rubber for war purposes, and we further urge that no private or selfish interest of any person, association, or corporation be permitted during our present extreme national emergency in any manner or by any means whatever to delay or hamper final and favorable consideration of such proposed measure; be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of State of the State of North Dakota cause copies of this resolution to be mailed to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to each Member of Congress from the State of North Dakota, to the Honorable Donald M. Nelson, Chairman of the War Production Board, and to each of the secretaries of state and the Members of Congress of the States of Montana, South Dakota, and Minnesota.

C. NORMAN BRUNSDALE,
W. J. TROUT,
Secretary of the Senate.
RALPH G. BEEDE,
Speaker of the House.
W. M. SMART,
Chief Clerk of the House.

ASSISTANCE FROM ARMED FORCES IN PLANTING AND HARVESTING CROPS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I desire to read into the RECORD a very brief extract from a letter written by Lloyd Rundell, a member of the Assembly of the Wisconsin Legislature, relating to the subject of the draft of a resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to authorize the granting of furloughs or release of persons in the armed forces for the planting and harvesting of crops and to limit the size of our armed forces.

This letter is from a man of large experience, a farmer who knows whereof he speaks.

With the new ration program in effect we should not hesitate a moment in seeing that production is not further curtailed by lack of labor.

We are facing a very critical food situation. The farm sections of this country are calling for men.

Mr. President, the letter I desire to read has a bearing upon this serious situation in the country. It reads:

WISCONSIN LEGISLATURE, ASSEMBLY CHAMBER,
Madison, February 15, 1943.

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have been over much of Wisconsin and find that there are millions of bushels of corn to be gathered. An early snow stopped the machines last fall. This corn will have to be husked by hand, as the snow has beaten it down to the ground. After the corn is gathered, the ground must be plowed, and crops planted. It can't help but be late, as very little fall plowing was done. We on our own farm wonder where the help is coming from, to care for three or four hundred little pigs, 1,200 chickens, 80 Guernsey cattle, besides 270 acres to be planted in oats, barley, flax, soybeans, canning peas and corn.

At least a million men should be available by April 1 to remain until June 1, and another million June 15 to stay until October 1. Can you send me the Congressional Journal?

Maximum cordiality,

LLOYD RUNDELL,
Assemblyman.

Mr. President, I ask that a draft of a proposed joint resolution of the Wisconsin Legislature follow the letter in the RECORD and be appropriately referred.

The draft of the proposed joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint Resolution A

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to authorize the granting of furloughs or release of persons in the armed forces for the planting and harvesting of crops and to limit the size of our armed forces

Whereas agriculture has lost more than 3,000,000 operators, farm workers, and year-around hired workers to war industry and the armed forces; and

Whereas the reduction of the manufacture of farm machinery, coupled with the inadequate prices to the farmer for his produce has afforded him neither the tools necessary to perform his job nor adequate compensation for his work; and

Whereas it has been estimated that millions of dollars' worth of crops were lost last year because they could not be harvested and dairy herds were slaughtered because of an inadequate amount of help; and

Whereas a great supply of food has now become so important that it equals military operations in determining the outcome of the war and will furnish the only sure way to peace and the only means of avoiding anarchy and bloodshed; and

Whereas the need for increasing the production of crops and other agricultural commodities in the year of 1943 is extremely critical and many hardships will be imposed upon the people of this country, as well as to all of our fighting allies, unless there is an increased production of food made possible by an adequate farm labor supply; and

Whereas it is suggested and recommended that the best means of alleviating the farm labor shortage would be to economize on other types of labor for the benefit of the farmer, to discontinue the drafting of labor from farms into the armed forces; and among other measures, to grant furloughs to the farm boys in the armed forces for the peak periods of planting and harvesting; and

Whereas it is extremely unwise to increase the size of our armed forces to such an extent that it impairs the ability of our farms to produce an adequate supply of foodstuffs: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly, the senate concurring, That this legislature hereby respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to authorize the granting of furloughs to suitable members of the armed forces in order that they might assist in the planting and harvesting of farm crops and caring for livestock and poultry under proper military direction; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, Secretary of the War Department, Secretary of the Navy Department, Secretary of Agriculture, and the War Manpower Commission, and to each House of Congress of the United States, and to each Wisconsin Member thereof.

RESOLUTION OF WAR COUNCIL MEETING OF MINERS AT DENVER, COLO.—AID TO SMALL MINING OPERATIONS

Mr. SCRUGHAM presented a resolution adopted by mining men assembled from all sections of the West at the first annual war council meeting held in conjunction with the forty-sixth annual meeting of the Colorado Mining Association at Denver, Colo., on January 29 and 30, 1943, which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We endorse the Special Small Business Committee of the Senate of the United States and commend its excellent work in attempting to stimulate a rational program in aid of small mining operations which add so materially to the production of strategic and critical minerals. We ask the continued efforts of this committee to this end and urge the committee, by investigation or otherwise, to secure effective cooperation of the Government in the discovery of new sources and the expansion of existing sources of these materials.

PAY-AS-YOU-GO TAX PLAN

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I have received many communications relating to the pay-as-you-go method of paying income taxes, but I have one in my hand from Nebraska submitted by Mr. G. A. Winters, general manager of the Grand Island Daily Independent, Grand Island, Nebr., which is a plan which may be considered optional to the Ruml plan. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the communication was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TAX PLAN

From G. A. WINTERS,

First, require everyone to file a tax return not later than March 15 and pay at least 25 percent of the tax due on 1942 income. Then give the taxpayer three optional methods of paying the 75-percent balance.

First option: If the taxpayer pays the entire 1942 tax on or before March 15, an allowance be made of 2½ percent of the total tax.

Second option: If the taxpayer pays the entire 1942 tax in four installments in 1943, allowances be made as follows: March 15 payment, no allowance; June 15 payment, 1 percent on that payment; September 15 payment, 2 percent; December payment, 3 percent. This would be a total of 1½ percent of the total tax.

Third option: Taxpayer to pay 25 percent of tax on March 15, and balance of tax, or 75 percent, be deferred over a period of 5 years. Twenty percent on this balance due would be added to 1943 tax, plus an interest charge of 2 percent; to 1944 tax a 20-percent payment, plus 4 percent; to 1945 tax a 20-percent payment, plus 6 percent; to 1946 tax a 20-percent payment, plus 8 percent; to 1947 tax a 20-percent payment, plus 10 percent. Total interest charge would figure 6 percent of the deferred tax, and the entire amount would be liquidated by the close of 1948. Any unpaid balance would be a lien on an estate, in case of death, and a first lien on assets of a corporation, if liquidated prior to 1948.

I believe millions of individuals and corporations would avail themselves of the first option, other millions on the second option, and that more than 75 percent of the total 1942 tax would be paid during 1943.

On the plan of deductions from 1943 earnings, I would suggest a 25-percent deduction, which would include the present Victory tax, from all salaries and wages after exemption, as is proposed, but also in addition give all taxpayers the following options:

An employed person could advise his employer to deduct any amount in excess of 25 percent, if such person thought his 1943 tax would be greater than the fund created by the minimum deduction. In other words, the 25-percent deduction would be the minimum, but could be increased at the option of the employee.

Corporations and individuals who are not employees could, if they desired, make application with the internal revenue department as a volunteer contributor, be given a permanent register number and make voluntary deposits monthly equal to one-twelfth of their estimated 1943 tax.

The 1943 tax returns would be made in the regular manner, and any credits that the taxpayer had accumulated during 1943 would be applied as a credit against the tax due on 1943 earnings.

Again I think millions would avail themselves of this privilege, it would bring millions of dollars into our National Treasury, and certainly would be a curb on inflation.

Yours truly,

G. A. WINTERS.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. RADCLIFFE, from the Committee on Commerce:

S. 163. A bill to amend section 511 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as amended, relating to ship construction reserve funds, and for other purposes; with amendments (Rept. No. 61); and

H. R. 133. A bill to amend and clarify certain provisions of law relating to functions of the War Shipping Administration, and for other purposes; with amendments (Rept. No. 62).

ADDITIONAL REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE GASOLINE AND FUEL OIL SHORTAGES (REPT. NO. 59)

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I submit herewith an additional report from the Special Committee to Investigate Gasoline and Fuel Oil Shortages, and because it deals with a subject of tremendous importance to the great majority of the people of the country, and more particularly to the people of the northern section of the country, where there has been acute distress in the last several months, I should like to call to the attention of the Senate two statements in the conclusions of the special Senate committee. First, I read the following:

CONCLUSIONS

1. The over-all picture: Little improvement in the over-all picture can be expected during this and the following wartime winters. It is likely that increased military demands will absorb the additional petroleum products transported to the eastern seaboard as a result of increased transportation facilities now being provided. For this reason all convertible oil-heating units should be converted to coal as soon as possible. But this is not enough. To avoid a serious coal transportation problem individual coal consumers should put in their coal during the coming summer. It is also possible that a fuel oil shortage may develop next winter in the States of Oregon and Washington. Efforts should be made to stock pile as much petroleum as possible in that area.

I thought I should call particular attention to that paragraph because the situation may be extremely serious next winter.

There is one other statement in the report, containing two paragraphs, which I should like to read. It is under the heading "Centralization of administrative authority," and is as follows:

5. Centralization of administrative authority: Administration of the various programs affecting the petroleum problem has not been sufficiently integrated. Until December 2, 1942, the Petroleum Coordinator was empowered only to consult the many other agencies regulating the production, transportation, distribution, and rationing of petroleum products. On December 2, 1942, by Presidential order, the position of Petroleum Coordinator was abolished and that of Petroleum Administrator for War was created. The Petroleum Administrator for War has somewhat more authority than the Petroleum Coordinator, but lacks the vital power to make final decisions and to enforce them in the various agencies. He can only attempt to persuade.

The centralization of authority in a single head with power to issue directives to other departments is essential. These directives should be final except where a conflict results between the oil program and some other program. The War Production Board should reconcile such differences.

I request that the report be printed and printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report submitted by Mr. MALONEY is as follows:

GASOLINE AND FUEL-OIL SHORTAGES

CONCLUSIONS

1. The over-all picture: Little improvement in the over-all picture can be expected during this and the following wartime winters. It is likely that increased military demands will absorb the additional petroleum products transported to the eastern seaboard as a result of increased transportation facilities now being provided. For this reason all convertible oil heating units should be converted to coal as soon as possible. But this is not enough. To avoid a serious coal-transportation problem individual coal consumers should put in their coal during the coming summer. It is also possible that a fuel-oil shortage may develop next winter in the States of Oregon and Washington. Efforts should be made to stock-pile as much petroleum as possible in that area.

2. The Eastern States: The States hardest hit in the East are Connecticut, Delaware, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, Vermont, and Virginia. South of Virginia the Atlantic Seaboard States have not suffered severe hardship. These States enjoy a milder climate and use proportionately larger amounts of coal and wood as fuel. For this reason it would contribute to a more realistic view of the situation along the Atlantic seaboard if district 1, now comprising the entire seaboard, were divided into two districts. The problems of the hardship area could be then viewed separately from those of the remainder of the States. Most statistics now available are given in bulk for the entire district.

3. The Middle Western States: The Middle Western States have suffered severe hardship this winter. While there has not been an actual shortage of oil in this area, it has been necessary to withdraw stocks from it to supply the East with transportation facilities. The committee agrees, and most of the persons in the Middle West have agreed, that it is proper for the entire country to share its oil-transportation facilities rather than that any particular area should suffer.

4. The far West: A change in requirements for the Pacific fighting fronts would create a shortage in Oregon and Washington which are now supplied by tanker. Plans should be made now to handle these contingencies.

5. Centralization of administrative authority: Administration of the various programs affecting the petroleum problem has not been sufficiently integrated. Until December 2, 1942, the Petroleum Coordinator was empowered only to consult the many other agencies regulating the production, transportation, distribution, and rationing of petroleum products. On December 2, 1942, by Presidential order, the position of Petroleum Coordinator was abolished and that of Petroleum Administrator for War was created. The Petroleum Administrator for War has somewhat more authority than the Petroleum Coordinator, but lacks the vital power to make final decisions and to enforce them in the various agencies. He can only attempt to persuade.

The centralization of authority in a single head with power to issue directives to other departments is essential. These directives should be final except where a conflict results between the oil program and some other program. The War Production Board should reconcile such differences.

6. Cooperation between military and civilian authorities: Lack of coordination between the military and the civil authorities resulted in a severe crisis during the latter part of December 1942, when the military authorities found it necessary to demand large quantities of oil for use in North Africa. At the present time arrangements are being worked out whereby Army and Navy officers will work closely with the petroleum industry and the Petroleum Administration for War. Active cooperation between these authorities is essential, with the military making every effort to advise civilian authorities of its needs reasonably far in advance. Actual military needs for battle operations must come first; but, on the other hand, complete disruption of civilian transportation, or recurring periods in which households are unheated, would produce a situation at home which would impair the war effort as seriously as a military defeat. The committee believes that such crises can be avoided by careful planning and cooperation.

7. Effect of prices on supply: Much of the hardship being suffered by fuel-oil consumers results from a price structure which discouraged the production, transportation, and accumulation of fuel oil in the places where it was most seriously needed. It is more profitable to produce and to sell gasoline than fuel oil, and the industry was allowed to produce the more profitable item at the expense of the less profitable one. Selling prices of both products were fixed at levels which discouraged dealers from accumulating stocks. Prices in the areas with the greatest demand were lower than those in areas where the need was not as great, resulting in a tendency to ship less to the place where the shipment would be less profitable.

8. Gasoline consumption: The public consumed enormous quantities of gasoline during the spring and summer of 1942 before teeth were put into the rationing system. During this period transportation and refining facilities which might have been used for fuel oil were instead utilized for gasoline. To achieve a proper balance between the quantities of fuel oil and gasoline production is imperative.

9. Transportation: Although much sincere effort has been spent on the problem of transporting petroleum into the distressed areas, the committee has too often been informed that things cannot be done rather than that a way must be found to do them. As a result, suggested improvements have been put into effect only after months of discussion, and in some cases delay nullifies the suggestion.

Substantially more petroleum products can be moved by rail. To date the railroads have done a magnificent job in increasing the movement of oil to district 1 from 5,000 barrels a day to over 800,000 barrels. However, the committee feels, and it has been assured by Mr. John J. Pelley, president, Association of American Railroads, that the railroads can do even more and are working to that end.

Consideration should be given to the pooling of oil for transportation, discontinuing the present practice of specifically earmarked individual shipments by companies to specific consumers. This would increase efficiency, as the pre-war marketing structure was not designed for present conditions. This proposal is by no means revolutionary, as oil going through pipe lines has been similarly pooled. To a certain extent this has been done by the Petroleum Administrator for War by designating terminals to receive trainload shipments. Supplies so received are allocated among all companies needing them. Much more should be done along these lines.

10. Tankers: Utilization of tankers is almost entirely in the hands of the Navy and the War Shipping Administration. While the committee has hesitated to ask for specific tanker routes, inasmuch as these might constitute secret military information, it is the committee's opinion that more oil could be brought to the east coast by tanker without impairing the war effort.

11. Barges: The use of barges also can and should be greatly increased.

12. Makeshifts: Greater ingenuity should be exercised to utilize makeshifts. In the summer of 1941 the use of box freight cars to carry steel drums of oil was urged. Now, after a year and a half, this proposal is being adopted.

13. Tank trucks: More attention should be given to utilizing existing tank trucks. Parts of the petroleum industry have complained of a shortage and asked that more be built, while dealers in the East have advised that tank trucks in that area are idle.

14. New pipe lines: The war emergency pipe line is being extended from Norris City to New York as rapidly as possible. Plans have also been completed for a second pipe line. The building of other pipe lines to the East depends on the availability of scarce materials for such pipe lines. Many of these materials are needed in the escort vessel, the aviation gasoline, and the synthetic rubber programs. Alternate methods of petroleum transportation which might consume less steel should be considered.

15. Fuel-oil rationing: Fuel-oil rationing should be simplified and much wider discretion given to local ration boards. Experience thus far shows that decentralization is the only practical solution to rationing. The committee would like to see a great decrease in the number of officeholders in Washington and an increase in the number of persons working with their own neighbors to solve individual problems in each area. The committee has received complaints from Governors and many others about long queues of persons waiting at ration boards.

Vigorous efforts should be made to get additional persons of high caliber to serve on boards. It should be recognized that rationing of all articles is going to be the most important single influence on daily civilian life in the next year or two. On this basis persons of outstanding ability can be induced to serve on ration boards. Sufficient funds should be provided for adequate and competent clerical staffs.

16. Rationing for next winter: It is too late for a substantial change in the method of rationing this winter. The disturbing effect of a major shift at this time would far outweigh the gains. On the other hand, some things should be done at once. The coupons for remaining periods should be made valid now to ease the strain on local distribution to the extent that existing stocks will permit. At the same time it should be vigorously emphasized that no more coupons are forthcoming.

For the next heating season serious consideration should be given to a straight-line percentage cut based on use during the 1941–42 heating season with provision for the local boards to grant relief in hardship cases. Some method must be established of reconciling the total number of rationing coupons outstanding with the total supply of oil available Consideration should be given to the possibility of allocating to each ration board a total number of oil ration coupons and allowing the board to decide between its own claimants. Due provision could be made for claims by any board for an additional allowance.

17. Integration of local distribution: A central authority should be charged with responsibility for integrating activities in each community. This authority should know where all supplies of fuel oil are to be found and should be authorized to fill emergency requirements without delay or red tape other than a brief spot check. This system has already been tried in some localities and found successful in easing the hardships which generally have resulted from break-downs in the rationing or distion systems.

18. Black markets and pleasure driving: Gasoline rationing along the Atlantic seaboard, where the amounts of gasoline are limited, should be tightened with the objective of eliminating black markets, and the allowances to preferred classes of motorcar drivers should also be examined in the light of the much smaller quantities of gasoline which are now available. The pleasure-driving ban should be redefined with particular care given to the needs of rural drivers.

Nation-wide gasoline rationing for the purpose of conserving rubber should be put on the basis of mileage with due weight given to the availability of rubber to the particular driver and his individual needs. To the extent that the rubber situation allows, more mileage should be permitted in sparsely populated areas where alternate forms of transportation are not available.

19. Integration of all passenger transportation: Passenger transportation in each part of the country should be integrated. The committee knows that many agencies have been talking about this for almost a year with no results. The pooling of automobiles and taxicabs has been only partly successful. Abandoned railroad lines remain abandoned. Vigorous efforts must be made to obtain maximum utilization of all vehicles.

20. Representation for smaller dealers and distributors: Attention should be given to the desirability of increasing the representation of smaller dealers and distributors on the industry committees. These dealers and distributors have played an important part in the petroleum business and their position in the business should be reflected on the committees. Moreover their lack of representation can hardly instill in them complete confidence that they will be fairly treated.

INTRODUCTION

Critical shortages of both fuel oil and gasoline, with widespread complaints of suffering, induced the committee to resume its investigation during December 1942. The efforts of a multiplicity of agencies had not been successful in averting the crisis brought on by an unusually cold December and the increased demands of the armed forces.

Information was drawn from many sources. Letters of inquiry were directed to the Governors, Senators, and Congressmen of each State, to the Government officials in charge of departments whose activities affected the oil and gasoline situation, to a great many oil companies, to the various oil industry war councils, to the railroads, and to many others.

The witnesses

The committee held open hearings on January 4, 11, 12, 13, and 27, 1943. Among the witnesses were Hon. Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior and Petroleum Administrator for War; Leon Henderson, formerly Price Administrator and Director of the Civilian Supply Division of the War Production Board; Joseph B. Eastman, Director of Defense Transportation; William Jeffers, Rubber Director; and Admiral Emory S. Land, War Shipping Administrator. Maj. J. A. Parten, Director of Transportation, Edward B. Swanson, Director of Research, J. Howard Marshall, Counsel, and Robert L. Minckler, Director of Petroleum Supply of the Petroleum Administration for War; John R. Turney, former Director, Motor Transport Conservation Division, John L. Rogers, Director, Motor Transport Division, Fayette Dow, Director of the Division of Petroleum and Other Liquid Transportation, and Ernest R. Holzborn, Director of Division of Inland Waterways of the Office of Defense Transportation, also appeared. John J. Pelley, president, Association of American Railroads, testified on rail transport of fuel oil and gasoline. Additional witnesses from the Office of Price Administration were Joel Dean, chief, Fuel Rationing Division, Charles F. Phillips, director, Automotive Supply Rationing Division, and John R. Richards, chief, Gasoline Rationing Branch. From some of the critical areas came Hon. WILLIAM J. MILLER, United States Representative from Connecticut; F. H. LaGuardia, mayor of the city of New York; Walter P. Hedden, director of port development, the Port of New York Authority; Maurice J. Tobin, mayor of Boston, Mass.; Stanley W. Church, mayor of New Rochelle, N. Y.; and Lester Scott, director of the oil heating division of the Merchants and Manufacturers Association of Washington, D. C.

Executive hearings were held with officers of the Army and Navy, with many members of the Petroleum War Council, and with persons in the petroleum industry. The committee also held numerous conferences.

The committee has two major objectives. First, it desires to dissipate the confusion in the public mind as to the prospects for future supplies of fuel oil and gasoline. To date gasoline and fuel-oil rations have been changed so often in district 1 that it is impossible for consumers to know what they can expect in the future. Much of the hardship of any rationing plan can be removed by letting the public know in advance what it may expect and what it must do.

The committee's second objective is to study the specific criticisms and suggestions offered by many persons who took the time and made the effort to appear before it and to answer its communications.

In the aggregate these suggestions are extremely valuable. The committee is of the opinion that advice of this type should be sought and followed more extensively.

The committee intends to continue its investigation in order to keep in touch with the manner in which petroleum products are supplied, transported, and distributed, so long as the shortage exists.

ADMINISTRATIVE ORGANIZATION

The committee believes that the shortages of fuel oil and gasoline have been intensified, and suffering increased, because of the present intolerable division of authority.

The problem of fuel oil and gasoline supply is chiefly in the hands of the Petroleum Administrator for War and the War Production Board. Through its price control the Office of Price Administration also influences the production of petroleum products.

Transportation problems are affected by the Petroleum Administrator for War, the Office of Defense Transportation, the Office of Price Administration, the War Production Board, the Army, the Navy, the War Shipping Administration, the Interstate Commerce Committee, and the Rubber Director.

Rationing is administered by the Office of Price Administration, the Office of Defense Transportation, and the Department of Agriculture. The Petroleum Administrator for War and the Rubber Director are vitally interested. The Petroleum Administrator should be in a position to tell the rationing authorities exactly how much petroleum they have to distribute. He is now doing so, but did not begin to do so until the middle of December. In areas where the rubber shortage requires that less gasoline should be distributed than is available, the further direction should come from the Rubber Director. A single authority should then handle the rationing function.

No one agency has complete authority. In the last analysis, disputes as to supply are resolvable by the War Production Board. The Petroleum Administrator for War has extensive powers to recommend, but not to direct. As a result the public has suffered delays, surprises, and inefficiencies. In the field of transportation the Office of Defense Transportation is supreme. The rationing field is divided between the Office of Price Administration and the Office of Defense Transportation. The supply situation resulting from this confusion of authority at least once was completely confounded by the fact that the Army and Navy stepped in and drained the supplies from the New York area without warning. The Army has very properly first call on petroleum stocks everywhere, but only after a severe shortage was created along the eastern seaboard, as a result of unexpected military demand, did the Army and the Navy begin to fully cooperate with the petroleum industry in an effort to avoid unnecessary emergencies.

The Executive order which established the Petroleum Administration for War was popularly supposed to have vested ultimate authority in Harold L. Ickes as Administrator. In practice, Mr. Ickes is not wielding his alleged authority. The committee, after careful perusal of the order, does not believe that he has it. He can make recommendations. He has no authority to compel their adoption.

In fact, the only effective additional power granted to Mr. Ickes by this directive was over the oil industry as such. Mr. Ickes did not even gain power to decide oil-rationing policies. This remained in the Office of Price Administration. As a result, public announcements of the Petroleum Administrator and of the Office of Price Administration are not always in accord.

The committee is convinced that the identity of the possessor of ultimate authority needs to be settled immediately and unmistakably.

TRANSPORTATION

The background

The present oil shortage is the result of a loss of normal transportation facilities and an increase in demands for petroleum products. Of the two, the loss of transportation facilities has been the major factor, particularly in that part of petroleum district 1 which includes the North and Middle Atlantic seaboard States.

Under normal conditions nearly all of the oil supply for the eastern seaboard was delivered by tankers from the Gulf coast around the tip of Florida and from the great oil-producing areas of Venezuela. Normally a 50 to 100 days' supply has been held in storage along the eastern coast, and this was drawn upon during the winter period of heavy demand and replaced the following summer.

The Middle West, which comprises petroleum district 2, is a great oil-producing area. It is also a huge consumer, and normally its production is about equal to local consumption. The Middle West has not normally supplied oil products to the East. Transportation facilities, therefore, have been geared for a long haul from the Gulf coast. In peacetime this haul was most economical by tanker. During the summer of 1941 large numbers of tankers were placed in the British service, creating a threatened shortage in the Atlantic-seaboard States. At this time railroads carried practically none of the east-coast supply, and Government officials stated that the railroads were not prepared to greatly increase their contribution.

At this point this committee was created to investigate gasoline and fuel-oil shortages. The committee learned that the railroads could haul much more petroleum than had been hauled by the tankers loaned to the British. The railroads have now accomplished this and much more, having increased the number of barrels they carry into district 1 daily from about 5,000 in 1941 to well over 800,000 at the present time.

Since Pearl Harbor we have lost many tankers. At the same time the need for tankers to transport oil and gasoline to the fighting fronts has absorbed practically all of the tanker facilities which remain. For domestic civilian consumption we must rely on railroads, pipe lines, and inland waterways.

Pipe lines

Pipe lines are much more expensive than tankers; railroad tank-car movement is even more costly than pipe line. Temporary expedients such as the use of steel drums loaded on box cars raise the expense even higher because of the labor necessary to handle them. Nonetheless, we must have the oil. This is not a matter of comfort. Oil to heat our homes is essential to the health of the Nation's workers; gasoline to maintain our transportation system is essential to our war production.

On the other hand, pipe lines require large quantities of materials and equipment for which they are in competition with other vital war programs. Therefore it is necessary that every effort be made to transport as much oil as possible by methods which will cause the least drain on other war programs. It appears, however, that large diameter pipe lines utilize less steel and other strategic materials than other types of new overland facilities.

Tankers

Admiral Emory S. Land, War Shipping Administrator, has advised the committee that the use of tankers to supply any significant portion of the needs of district 1 is out of the question for at least 1 year. Some petroleum products do come to the east coast by tanker, but the committee believes that this quantity cannot be regarded as an addition to supplies in district 1 in view of the larger quantities of oil products withdrawn for use abroad.

On the other hand, without in any way interfering with war shipments abroad, it is possible to utilize some tankers to a certain extent for supplying the east coast. Tankers not infrequently arrive too late to leave in a convoy and have to wait, loaded, in east-cost ports for the next convoy. These tankers might better be utilized by unloading their cargo and making a round trip to the Gulf ports for a fresh cargo before the next convoy. Again, it is possible that new tankers could more wisely make a "shake-down cruise" along the coast instead of across wide stretches of water. New tankers require a great deal of adjustment during their first voyage. By running them along the coast, considerable risk of serious accident could be eliminated and petroleum products delivered to the Atlantic seaboard.

It has been difficult for the committee to study intensively the utilization of those tankers which are now available. This subject is entirely in the hands of the armed forces and the War Shipping Administration. The figures and data are considered military secrets into which the committee is extremely reluctant to probe. The committee has constantly been interested, however, in finding assurances that the tanker routes to the fighting areas are the shortest possible. It has suggested that more tankers might be sent to Africa directly from West Indies ports. It also urges that, where possible, convoys be sent abroad directly from Gulf-coast ports. The committee understands that the trip to Europe from New York is far shorter than from Texas, but it is longer than the circuitous voyage from the Gulf to New York and thence to Europe.

One reason behind the sending of tankers, and tank cars as well, to Gulf coast ports is to relieve refineries at these points of the huge quantities of gasoline and distillates which are incidental byproducts of aviation gasoline and other war products. The committee has suggested to the Office of Price Administration and the Petroleum Administrator that some other means might be found to give financial relief to these refineries so that tankers and tank cars will not be required to make the long trip to the Gulf ports to pick up supplies.

Barges

The increased use of barges also can help to relieve the situation. Congress has been recommending such increase and found the administrative agencies extremely slow in adopting this proposal. Various reasons have been suggested to the committee, such as lack of motive power and the limited capacity of the inland waterways. However, it is believed that to date no sufficiently vigorous effort has been made to locate the motive power, and that much could be done to increase the efficiency of the waterways.

Railroads

The committee has been advised that the railroads expect to increase substantially their capacity to carry oil by removing bottlenecks and inefficiencies. The railroads have worked diligently at this task and at the time of this report had achieved a considerably increased load. It is believed that still more can be done to provide switching, loading, and unloading facilities at terminals and to utilize the large storage capacities and unloading facilities of the independent distributors.

Careful study should also be given to the possibility of increasing the quantities of petroleum products which the railroads could carry by pooling all oil products at the point of origin. Mr. John J. Pelley, president of the Association of American Railroads, testified before the committee that one reason there are so few solid trains carrying only fuel oil to the East was the large number of shipments and the diversity of points of destination. As a result, single oil cars are put into trains carrying other types of freight and considerable time is lost in handling. Mr. Pelley agreed that if oil from the various companies could all be pooled and made up into solid trains which would then proceed to the places where the oil is needed without regard to the destination determined by the shipper, there could be some improvement. He qualified this by saying that allowances would have to be made for the different types and grades of oil. If this were done, a shipper would simply deliver the oil to the railroad and the consignee would receive a document entitling him to a specific quantity of a certain type of oil, but not necessarily to any particular tank car full of oil. In this way the tank cars could be moved with regard to the railroads' facilities and the requirements of each region.

At the committee's hearings last year it was recommended that a large quantity of petroleum products could be shipped in box cars if steel drums were utilized. In the last month, after a year and a half of delay, this proposal was adopted with a resultant increase of 20,000 barrels a day of oil brought into district 1.

The committee recently recommended to the Petroleum Administrator that pending the completion of the pipe line to Norris City, Ill., tank cars should be used to drain the Illinois area of its surplus, which could then be readily restored upon the completion of the pipe line to Norris City, Ill. This would have benefited the east coast, since the tank-car turn-around time from the Chicago area is 10 or 11 days, as compared with 19 or 20 from Texas. The committee is convinced that a great many more cars could have been used for this purpose and that at the present time this is still feasible. However, it was not until February 1943 that the Petroleum Administrator took some action in this direction by increasing shipments of fuel oil from district 2 by 30,000 barrels a day. Larger shipments were not approved for such reasons as a lack of surplus in district 2, east of the Mississippi River, and the necessity of relieving Gulf coast refineries. The first reason did not jibe with figures in the committee's possession obtained from the Petroleum Administrator. As for the second, while the committee realizes the need to relieve the Gulf coast refineries of the financial and physical burden of producing vast quantities of fuel oil and gasoline in the course of making aviation gasoline, it is not actually necessary to ship these products to the east coast if they can be obtained closer to home as stated above.

This winter, even with rationing, east coast consumption of petroleum products has exceeded deliveries by 156,000 barrels a day since November 1, 1942. The balance has come out of the now depleted inventories. As a result of the proposed increase in efficiency by the railroads, and the shorter haul resulting from the completion of the Big Inch pipe line to Norris City, tank-car deliveries to district 1 should rise to about 900,000 barrels a day. Pipe lines will deliver an additional 300,000 barrels a day over their top 1942 capacity after the Big Inch has been completed. With additional usage of barges, ocean tankers, and various makeshifts, and with a continuance of strict rationing, it is conceivable that by next winter the present deficit might be transformed into an excess of 150,000 or more barrels a day.

On the other hand, further tanker losses or additional requirements for the armed forces could easily wipe out this anticipated surplus and turn it into a shortage. Should this occur, next winter will be even more difficult than the present one, inasmuch as it is not likely that inventories can be built up this summer equal to those we carried into the winter of 1942 because of military requirements.

It is therefore clear that additional transportation facilities should be provided if this is at all possible. The committee does not emphasize a particular type of facility that should be provided, since this depends on the availability of materials and labor in a market where petroleum transportation competes with such programs as the aviation gasoline, escort vessel, and synthetic rubber program.

The consumer on the eastern seaboard is in a position to make an effective contribution to the solution of this problem. It should be clear that he will not be any better off next winter than he is this winter, because the prospective 150,000 barrel surplus is based on rationed requirements. If that surplus disappears, the consumer may well be in a far worse situation next year.

Fuel oil users should therefore convert to coal, and should acquire their winter supply of fuel during the summer of 1943. Financial assistance should be given to those who need it, and plans should be made so that necessary equipment is readily available. It is urgent that coal be stored during the summer, as railroads will not be able to provide it if they must carry the fuel oil load during the fall and winter.

The far West thus far has not suffered seriously, but a change in requirements for the Pacific fighting fronts would create a shortage in Oregon and Washington, which are supplied by tanker. Increased requirements for the fighting forces in the Pacific would also draw away large quantities of the supply available to the remainder of the Pacific coast. Plans should be made at this time to handle these contingencies. Increased storage space should be provided and utilized. Conversion from oil to other fuels should be accomplished.

FUEL-OIL RATIONING

The committee has held extensive hearings with respect to the administration of fuel oil rationing. Representatives of the public, the fuel oil dealers, and the Office of Price Administration have been heard and examined. The opinions of Governors, Congressmen, and Senators throughout the Nation have been solicited and carefully analyzed. Hundreds of letters from individuals affected have been considered.

The problems of rationing nonindustrial fuel oil must be divided into two groups: First, those affecting the heavier household heating oils, and second, kerosene and range oil.

Kerosene and range oil

The committee believes that kerosene and range oil should not be rationed at all. They are used primarily by poor persons who are not addicted to waste and who have not the funds to insulate their homes. They are of necessity purchased in very small quantities, as most consumers of this type of fuel do not have large storage tanks. The total quantity of this fuel used is comparatively small and it should have been possible to supply all consumers without attempting any rationing.

Instead of doing this, a rationing system was attempted but it broke down and caused much hardship. Stocks were kept at a very low point, so that dealers were unable to supply their customers. On the other hand, a great many persons, who otherwise would not have used this type of fuel, were allowed to buy auxiliary kerosene heaters in order to evade the rationing restrictions.

Integration of local distribution

Much can be done to relieve the hardships suffered this winter by the establishment of central depots for each community to which persons completely out of oil can apply for quick relief. This expedient has been put into effect successfully in a few communities and, the committee is informed, is being tried elsewhere. It is equally applicable to the rationing problem with respect to the heavier fuel oils. The committee hopes that it will be generally adopted. Boston and New York have used it successfully.

There should be some central authority in each community which would know the quantities of fuel oil in every storage facility and what additional quantities are in transit, and the dates when the new supplies can be expected. This general agency could also be called upon in all emergencies to supply those who need oil in a hurry.

THE RATIONING FORMULA

The committee found several serious defects in the present fuel-oil rationing system. In an effort to achieve a scientific standard a complex mechanism was devised which, despite its complexity, failed to arrive at a proper result in a substantial number of cases. The method of determining the ration penalizes the consumer who uses more oil than is permitted under an allegedly scientific formula. The formula does not take into consideration such conditions as exposure, structure of the house, wind velocity, and height of ceilings. The Office of Price Administration contends that these factors are compensated by the weight given to past consumption figures, but past consumption figures are taken into consideration only when they substantially agree with the formula. Where past consumption figures are high, according to a chart which does not take into effect the above factors, past consumption is given practically no weight in determining the ration. The Office of Price Administration has justified this practice by saying that the inefficient consumer should be penalized, but obviously some houses consume more oil because of their location or structure without being inefficient. The method of computing the ration is designed to force the inefficient consumer to convert. Interoffice memoranda of the Office of Price Administration show it was the purpose of the rationing regulations to penalize most heavily the old house with an old oil-burning system. In this way, the memoranda state, persons with this type of equipment will be forced to convert.

The memoranda show that the Price Administrator was unwilling to take a forthright position to force conversion of equipment to coal, because he felt that no matter who was required to convert the rules would be attacked as unfair. Instead, a vicious regulation was devised to force conversion by those who are least able to do so and least able to protest.

Four distinct formulae were devised to calculate the oil allowable for homes, together with complex forms to furnish the information needed to apply the rules.

The first rule limits the square footage a family of given size may heat. Thus, a single person is entitled to heat 2,000 square feet. Two people may have 2,600, additional persons 300 additional feet each, up to a maximum of 3,500 feet.

Next, the Office of Price Administration obtained temperature data for the past 43 years for every county in America. Thus, they calculated how much each county was above or below normal last year. They then prepared a consumption table for each county. This adjusts last year's consumption to that of a hypothetical normal year and then applies a one-third cut.

Having obtained a figure from the consumption table, the rationer must turn to the area table. One column of this table indicates how much oil an efficient house of a given square footage in that locality should theoretically use, after applying a one-third cut to normal use. This column is known as the midrange. There are two other columns, one giving the maximum and the other the minimum ration allowable for that square footage. Each varies from the midrange by about 13 percent. If the figure given by the consumption table exceeds the maximum ration the maximum indicated is the final ration. If the figure given by the consumption table is less than the minimum ration for the square footage, the so-called special base on the consumption table is consulted. This column applies only a 15-percent cut to the previous year's use. Then the special base or the minimum ration, whichever was less, was given as the final ration.

The rules permit an additional 125 gallons irrespective of the size of the house for the presence of a child under 4. This is a clear discrimination in favor of the owner of a small house. A percentage of the ration would be far fairer.

The theory underlying all this ritual was to avoid penalizing the efficient user while forcing the inefficient to amend his ways. Joel Dean, Chief of the Fuel Rationing Division, testified before the committee that the Office of Price Administration feared that people who had kept their houses at 80° F. with all the windows open might suffer no hardship by the rationing if a straight percentage cut had been applied.

Whatever one's view of the theory underlying the system of calculating the ration, in practice it has collapsed. Volunteers, rushed to distraction and unable to grasp so quickly the elaborate and intricate system, have fallen back on rules of thumb like a gallon a square foot. Local boards have been weeks behind in processing applications, a situation accentuated by the failure to issue coupons to the boards until months after the rationing was in effect. Errors are common. Even without error, a cut as high as 75 percent or as low as 15 percent of the previous winter's consumption is perfectly possible.

The committee believes that a simple flat percentage cut, adjusted for temperature variation, with discretion in the ration boards to alleviate hardship, would have worked adequately. The red tape would have been eliminated, and the consumer would have understood the process.

Another major defect of the present plan is the division of the coupons into five heating periods, with minor overlaps. At a time when trucks, tires, and drivers are as scarce and precious as rubies, this has cut the amount of the average delivery almost in half. This, of course, multiplies deliveries. The average householder can be trusted to budget his own fuel without mechanical assistance, if he is convinced that no extra ration will be forthcoming.

GASOLINE RATIONING

Gasoline rationing on the Atlantic seaboard must be considered separately from the remainder of the country. In the Eastern States gasoline rationing is predicated on a shortage of gasoline as a result of insufficient transportation facilities. Elsewhere gasoline rationing is designed to reduce driving to an average of 5,000 miles per year per vehicle in order to conserve tires.

Rationing in the East

Along the Atlantic seaboard the principal difficulties have been the existence of black markets and lack of information as to the facts. The public has not known from week to week and sometimes from day to day, how much gasoline it could count on. On one occasion all gasoline sales were stopped completely; on other occasions the value of the ration card was reduced; and still again, without warning, pleasure driving was banned, although it was perfectly obvious that many of the persons receiving A cards would use them primarily for pleasure driving.

The authorities also have suffered for lack of information and this has been the reason for the last-minute changes. Lack of information has also been one of the principal reasons for the existence of black markets. Under the original rationing system put into effect early in the summer, truck operators were given all the gasoline they wanted with the result that a vastly larger number of coupons was outstanding than the amount of gasoline trucks could legitimately use. Under the present system whereby trucks are certified for a certain amount of mileage by the Office of Defense Transportation, there has been some tightening of control. Nonetheless, the difficulties remain. Charles F. Phillips, Director of the Automotive Supply Rationing Division of the Office of Price Administration, admitted to the committee that he did not know how many coupons were outstanding:

"The CHAIRMAN. But there could be twice as many coupons out as there are barrels of oil in the tanks?

"Mr. PHILLIPS. It is conceivable that is correct.

"The CHAIRMAN. Does that give you any worry about a black market?

"Mr. PHILLIPS. If they were outstanding, I would be very definitely worried about that.

"The CHAIRMAN. But they may be outstanding, so far as you know?

"Mr. PHILLIPS. The point is, we do not have records at this moment which would allow us to say one way or the other that that is correct."

There is no question that black markets do exist and that they must be eliminated. The committee feels, however, that the soundest approach to this problem must be premised upon an understanding that public opinion is the chief weapon against black markets. To mobilize public opinion people must have confidence in the information received from the administrative agencies, and must at least understand some of the reasons for the regulation. The ban on pleasure driving, for instance, while extremely effective in taking automobiles off the road, would have much greater public support if "pleasure driving" were accurately defined and if that definition made reasonable allowances for transportation conditions in various communities. In rural areas, for instance, or suburban districts where transportation is very poor, the use of the automobile cannot be restricted as it should be in cities. The city dweller can find transportation to a moving picture or to a friend's home. On the other hand the rural, and often the suburban, dweller must use his automobile or stay at home. If he stays at home he loses touch with his neighbors and his usefulness will suffer.

Regulations affecting the use of automobiles and gasoline rationing should be carefully thought out before they are issued, so that their first impact on the public will be an incentive to cooperation. Even the policemen who were asked to enforce the original pleasure ban were not officially given a definition of pleasure driving.

Nation-wide rationing

In areas outside of district No. 1 where the preservation of rubber is the principal consideration in gasoline rationing, greater care should be given to tailoring ration cards to the particular needs of the driver, taking into consideration the amount of rubber available to the particular driver, and if possible the gasoline consumption of the automobile, and the availability of alternative transportation to the driver.

At the present time there is no shortage of reclaimed rubber which is suitable for recapping passenger automobile tires. For this reason every consideration should be given to allowing all the mileage possible to drivers outside of district No. 1.

On the other hand, to the extent that Nation-wide gasoline rationing is dependent on the completion of synthetic rubber plants, it may be necessary to reconsider the entire subject in view of the delays in the synthetic rubber program. If the 5,000-mile average was based on the completion of full synthetic rubber capacity by the middle of 1944, it may have to be revised as a result of the decision which in effect postpones a great portion of the synthetic rubber program.

Commercial vehicles

To date there has been no attempt to limit the actual transportation of goods by motor vehicles. The plan for rationing has been intended to eliminate only inefficiencies and wasteful operations. To accomplish this, the Office of Defense Transportation attempted to obtain a great deal of information about truck operations. Every operator was required to fill out a very complicated 4-page form indicating by quarters for the past 2 years his use of gasoline, his mileage, his average load factor, and a considerable quantity of miscellaneous information.

By analyzing these forms, the Office of Defense Transportation expected to eliminate a number of operations which they considered wasteful and yet permit each truck operator to transport goods as in the past. Examples of the type of operations which it was desired to eliminate are call-backs—that is, making more than one call a day to particular points, loads below capacity, and special services.

To process the forms it was proposed to gather all questionnaires except those of large fleet operators at a single office in Detroit. There they were to be analyzed by a large staff. On the basis of the analysis the operator was to receive a certificate of war necessity allowing him to operate a given number of miles in each quarter of the coming year.

The plan quickly collapsed. Millions of small truck operators, and particularly farmers, either did not understand the form or did not have the requested information concerning the details of their operations. As a result, a large proportion of the forms were returned to the Office of Defense Transportation incompletely made out. To handle the complex problem of deciding how much of a truck operator's mileage was actually necessary under efficient operating conditions, a large clerical staff was recruited in Detroit. A large part of the personnel possessed only very limited education. Wages were low, and would not attract more qualified persons in an area like Detroit where a labor shortage exists. The Office of Defense Transportation admits an error of as high as 5 percent, and this seems to the committee to be conservative.

As soon as the farmers and small truckers began to receive their certificates of war necessity, a wave of protest arose which compelled the Office of Defense Transportation to permit the local war boards of the Department of Agriculture, in the case of farmers, and the local ration boards, in the case of commercial operators, to issue temporary rations until February 1. Neither the Office of Price Administration nor the Office of Defense Transportation appears to have an accurate idea of the amount of coupons which were issued, and the resultant situation is chaotic from the standpoint of attempting to calculate the demand for gasoline.

For a permanent rationing system the Office of Defense Transportation proposes to leave the farmers in the hands of the local war boards and to handle truck applications at its own district offices turning the certificates of war necessity over to the ration boards for their actual issuance of the coupons. There is no reason to believe that the system has resulted or will result in increased efficiency in operations. The regulations with respect to increasing truck efficiency could be enforced more directly without making an effort to calculate the amount of gasoline the individual saves and to cut his ration accordingly. This results in a complicated operation and could just as easily be achieved by specific order to the trucker. The system has not worked as a check on the amount of gasoline outstanding and has in fact become one of the primary sources of black-market coupons.

The committee believes that truckers should be allowed as much mileage as they can show they actually need and that specific regulations should be designed to enforce efficiency.

Serious consideration should be given to the necessity of eliminating certain types of trucking operations as a result of the tire shortage. The Office of Defense Transportation is in charge of this. To date no system has been evolved for reducing the gasoline consumption of trucks engaged in transporting luxuries. The Office of Defense Transportation has conceded that the present system of rationing would have to be changed and new information obtained from the truckers if an attempt were made to ration on the basis of commodity carried.

On the other hand, gasoline rationing may be the wrong way to restrict transportation of luxuries. Should this become necessary as a result of the tire shortage, it could be accomplished by a direct prohibition. If the purpose is to eliminate or curtail the manufacture of luxury products, this also should be done directly. It would be absurd to cut off the flow of commerce at the transportation level. Manpower and materials should not be wasted producing goods to lie idle in storage. Similarly, trucks should not be permitted to operate on a curtailed basis to carry luxuries, or to lie idle, but should be transferred to the transportation of essential goods in the event that the rubber and replacement parts situation requires such a change.

The public passenger transportation is becoming increasingly congested as a result of restrictions on the use of passenger automobiles, increased travel in areas of war-work activities and lack of new facilities. Vigorous efforts must be made to achieve maximum utilization of all transportation facilities, including private automobiles, abandoned transportation lines, and all other equipment which could possibly be put in use. This problem has been given some thought by the Office of Defense Transportation, but is one which requires actual practical application in the field. Experts should be found who can analyze each critical area and propose a plan for handling its problems. In particular, such plan should include full utilization of private automobiles. These are a substantial portion of the Nation's wealth and of its transportation system. They should be fully exploited.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL HOME LOAN BANK AND HOME OWNERS' LOAN ACTS

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I introduce two bills for appropriate reference, and ask that a statement relating to the proposed amendments to the Federal Home Loan Bank Act be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bills introduced by Mr. WAGNER were each read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, as follows:

S. 756. A bill to amend the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, as amended; and

S. 757. A bill to amend section 5 of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, as amended.

The statement presented by Mr. WAGNER in connection with the bills is as follows:

AMENDMENTS TO FEDERAL HOME LOAN BANK ACT

Section 1 would provide that the Federal home-loan banks may make advances to their member institutions on the security of any mortgage or obligation which is insured under the National Housing Act or for which a commitment to insure has been made under that act, or as to which the member institution has insurance under that act. No such advance could exceed 90 percent of the unpaid principal of the mortgage or obligation offered as collateral for the advance.

Under existing law the Federal home-loan banks have a limited power to make advances on mortgages insured under the National Housing Act, but the member institutions cannot put up as collateral for such advances loans which they have made with the insurance protection provided in title I of the National Housing Act but for which they have not taken mortgage security. Also, they cannot use for this purpose mortgages insured under title II which have more than 20 years' unexpired maturity. It is believed that, insofar as these types of loan are deemed worthy of insurance under the National Housing Act, they should be acceptable as collateral security for advances by the Federal home-loan banks.

Section 2 deals with the base for the issuance of consolidated Federal home-loan bank debentures, which are the joint and several obligations of all the Federal home-loan banks. At present, such debentures may not be issued in excess of five times the total paid-in capital of all the Federal home-loan banks nor in excess of the notes or obligations of member institutions held by all the banks and secured under section 10 (a) of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act. However, no provision is made for including in the debenture base secured advances made under other provisions of the Federal Home Loan Bank Act or for including therein obligations of or fully guaranteed by the United States which are owned by the Federal home-loan banks. The present section would include these items, but would retain the existing provision that such debentures may not in any event be issued in excess of five times the total paid-in capital of the Federal home-loan banks.

Section 3 is the most important section of the bill. It would authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase obligations of the Federal home-loan banks and of the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, up to a limit of three times the capital stock, reserves, and surplus of the banks or the insurance corporation, as the case may be. The Secretary of the Treasury would have entire discretion as to such purchases, being merely authorized and not required to make them.

The Federal home-loan banks (which provide reserve-credit facilities for nearly 3,800 members, comprising savings and loan associations and similar institutions, savings banks, and insurance companies) and the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation (which insures, up to $5,000 for each investor in each institution, the safety of accounts in approximately 2,400 savings and loan associations and similar institutions) are designed to stabilize local savings and home-financing institutions and thus to aid in protecting the whole financial structure. Under ordinary conditions the banks and the insurance corporation will have no difficulty in obtaining necessary funds in the open market. However, the provision here proposed is essential as a bulwark in times of stress, when they might not be able to market their obligations to the public on reasonable terms. Its enactment would be in accordance with other measures for Government purchase or guaranty of obligations of Federal agencies, as in the case of the Federal Reserve System, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Federal Public Housing Authority, the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation, and other agencies which have this protection.

Section 4 deals with examinations of the Federal home-loan banks. The existing law requires that they be examined "at least twice annually." The present section would change this to read "at least annually."

Thus the Federal Home Loan Bank Administration would not be required to examine the banks oftener than once a year, but would still have authority to examine them more often if it saw fit to do so. It is believed that the section would make possible some economy in money cost and in personnel, while preserving all essential authority.

Section 5 is the usual separability provision.

AMENDMENTS TO HOME OWNERS' LOAN ACT OF 1933

This bill, which consists of only one section, would make two changes in Section 5 (c) of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, dealing with the lending and investment powers of Federal savings and loan associations.

At present, a Federal savings and loan association may make real-estate loans only on first liens of not over $20,000 on homes or combinations of homes and business property within 50 miles of its home office, except that not over 15 percent of its assets may be loaned on first liens on "other improved real estate" without regard to these limitations. The present section would change the words "other improved real estate" to "any improved real estate", so as to negative any construction that homes and combination home and business properties are excluded from the 15 percent provision.

In addition, the bill would provide that a Federal association may invest its funds in any mortgage or obligation as to which the association is protected by insurance under the National Housing Act, or for which a commitment to insure has been issued under that act. Federal associations would thus be able to make use of the provisions of Title I of the National Housing Act insuring financial institutions with respect to alteration, repair, and improvement loans made without the expense and delay incident to title searches and the taking of mortgage security. These associations would in this way be enabled to participate more fully in the war housing program, which has recognized the need for the prompt supplying of additional family units in defense areas through the conversion of existing dwellings into a greater number of family units and the restoration and rehabilitation of dwellings now unsuitable or uninhabitable.

TRIBUTE TO HON. JAMES E. WATSON

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, my native State of Indiana has long been known as the home of great authors of literature, and as the birthplace of great statesmen. In this present day, when one surveys the list of men who are prominent in the directing of our war effort, it can also be said of my Hoosier State that it is the home of great executives. However, it is not often that twin attributes of author and statesman are revealed in one person.

It was my pleasure a week ago to attend a function at which the outstanding feature on the post-prandial program was the toast given by my able colleague, the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS], to his predecessor, Hon. James E. Watson. This tribute contained such delightful humor, such subtle satire, and such an appreciation of the human philosophy of Mr. Watson's character as are rarely heard from one given to the serious duties of statesmanship in these trying days.

For the delectation of all his former associates, and for the pleasure of thousands of people of Indiana who hold Jim Watson in the kindliest esteem, I ask unanimous consent to have this estimate of him by a lifetime acquaintance inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JIM WATSON

(By FREDERICK VAN NUYS)

As a Hoosier, I am very glad to present a very meager thumbnail sketch of the career and characteristics of my fellow Hoosier, Jim Watson.

If I were to begin this recital in the conventional way, I should start with the date of his birth but for the life of me I can't find out what it was.

I have read all his obituaries in the old Congressional Directories and Who's Who, but the date of his birth has been carefully concealed. I, therefore, leave it to you and Leon Henderson to find that out for yourselves.

I do know this much, however. He was born in Randolph County, Ind., in the early part of the last century.

There is very little to learn about his early life or his scholastic training—if he had any.

It was only after his marriage—and his friends say largely on account of his marriage—that he got started on his successful career. Having heard a great voice and being possessed of a great vision and the bearer of a great message, just like Wendell Willkie, he moved to Rushville, Ind. The sun bathed and blossomed, scented hills and valleys of dear old Rush County appealed to both Watson and Willkie as more fertile political fields for the cultivation of their great message than Winchester, Ind., or Wall Street and the Bronx in the great city of New York where nine-tenths of its citizens still believe that the United States of America is bounded on the west by the Allegheny Mountains.

But I am digressing from my theme. I am going to stick with Jim Watson and leave Wendell Willkie to the tender ministrations of that distinguished trio of wet nurses—CHARLEY MCNARY, ARTHUR VANDENBERG, and BOB TAFT. Maybe through their tender and intimate ministrations they may be able finally to discover his political sex—whether it be Democratic or Republican or both, or none—and so end the great suspense. [Laughter.]

Now back to Watson.

What characteristics made Jim Watson successful?

First he is one of the best story-tellers in America. Again his stories usually are directed at himself and carry no stings.

I am going to give you just one as a sample.

When Jim, as a young man, was making an honest living practicing law—that was, of course, before he went into politics—he was trying a law suit. It was a jury trial.

Having lunch with his client, Jim noticed that his client seemed somewhat perturbed and asked him why.

"Well," said the client. "Don't you think that we ought to get another lawyer to help you?" "Why,", said Jim, "I thought I was doing a good job. What's the matter with me?"

"Well, it's like this," said the client. "You see the other side has two lawyers and when one of them is talking the other one is thinking. Now on our side, when you're up talking nobody's thinking."

Second. Jim Watson is a shrewd observer and keen politician.

As illustrative of this, I want to relate an incident or two.

In one of his early campaigns for the House, he knew that one of the southern counties in his district was made up almost exclusively of Germans. Jim saw his chance. He couldn't speak German but he immediately took up its study through a correspondence school. A few weeks later he went down there to attend a big rally. Jim was prepared. He bought a pair of wooden shoes and danced with all the buxom German girls and much to the surprise of his audience delivered his political speech in German. Of course, the audience, which was composed of real Germans, couldn't understand one-tenth of what he was trying to say but they all went home and pronounced it a fine speech.

I said that nine-tenths of his audience did not understand what he was trying to say.

I might add right here that the same observation might be made concerning many of Jim's later speeches made in English—2 hours long—on the tariff, our monetary system and, kindred subjects, but they all went away and said it was a fine speech.

Jim early in life gave voice to one of the guiding political philosophies of his life.

It was—"If you can't beat 'em, jine 'em."

He not only gave voice to that philosophy but he practiced it.

To my certain knowledge he at one time belonged to 28 different fraternal orders and scores of similar organizations. In "jineing" up Jim never let a little thing like consistency interfere with his activities.

For instance, at one and the same time he was affiliated with the Ancient Order of Hibernians and sub rosa, of course, the directing head of the Ku Klux Klan. For years he carried an honorary membership in the bartenders union, and during the same time was the most vociferous advocate and defender of the Women's Christian Temperence Union. During prohibition, he outrivaled Carrie Nation on the stump but knew the back door of every drug store in Indiana. [Laughter.]

It has been said that a leopard cannot change his spots nor an Ethiopian his skin. Well—I just wish all of you could have known Jim Watson in his prime.

Just one more late instance of this quality.

The election in 1938 in Indiana was too close to be comfortable. I speak advisedly. The change of a handful of votes would have changed the results.

Soon after the election, Jim was having lunch with an Indiana newspaperman and out of the clear sky he spoke up and said, "You know I could have beaten VAN NUYS this time if they had nominated me out there at Indianapolis."

"How's that?" asked the newsman.

"Well, the vote in Terre Haute decided the election. All the profiteers, gangsters, and racketeers down there voted for Van Nuys. If I had been on the ticket they would all have voted for me and I would have been elected."

Take that for what it is worth.

Now, in addition to the qualities above named, Jim, of course, possessed many substantiating qualities. He was a great campaigner.

I wish you could have seen him in his prime. He would ruffle up his long hair, slap his right thigh with that big right paw, point his long bony index finger at his audience and so dramatically and fervently describe the iniquities of the Democratic Party that cold chills ran up and down the spines of his hearers and the next day even the children in the streets shied around Democrats as something unclean and dangerous like the lepers in Ben Hur.

Yes, Jim was a great campaigner. He has kissed more babies, coddled more mothers, eaten more cold mashed potatoes and head lettuce with Thousand Island dressing at political banquets, listened to more long-winded introductory speeches, slept in more cold spare bedrooms, promised more jobs, and slapped more people on the back than any other 10 men in the United States of America.

In fact, he slapped so many backs that a recent survey shows that 8 out of every 10 of the older men and women in Indiana today are suffering from sacroiliac trouble due to Watson's campaigning. He was a godsend to the chiropractors and osteopaths of Indiana. He made 'em rich. Now they want him to come back and start in on the coming generation. [Laughter.]

To boil it all down, Jim Watson for 50 years was cussed and discussed more than any other man in Indiana. But it worked and he managed to serve his country—and incidentally stay on the Federal pay roll—for half a century. But like everything else except taxes, Jim's public service came to an end. He was caught in the political cataclysm of 1932.

I have heard since coming down here, that, prior to that election, he was frequently asked by his colleagues what sort of opposition he had. The substance of his reply was: "Oh, not much. My opponent is a young mine-run lawyer without much experience or background. Off the record, I think he is a push-over."

I happened to be elected and when Jim was asked by these same colleagues how it came about he said, "That fellow VAN NUYS is a wonder—a second Daniel Webster—an eminent jurist and statesman—nobody could have beaten him." He said it so frequently and so vociferously that I have been embarrassed ever since I have been down here trying to live up even to even a fractional part of Jim's alibi.

Anybody can be a good winner in poker or politics but it takes a good sport to be a good loser. Along with his other qualities, Jim is a good loser.

So that's that—a very meager thumb nail sketch of Jim Watson—the Hoosier boy of humble origin who by the hard way and by his own efforts became one of the best known, best liked, and most colorful political figures in the Nation.

May he and his fine wife have many, many more years of health, happiness, and prosperity. [Prolonged applause.]

STRIKES AND SLOW-DOWNS IN WAR PRODUCTION—SPEECH BY CAPT. EDDIE RICKENBACKER

Mr. O'DANIEL. Mr. President, I am proud indeed to have gained such a worthy ally as Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker in my fight to speed up the production of greatly needed war weapons for our soldiers by stopping strikes, slow-downs, and absenteeism in war factories, and removing the restrictions which keep people from working as many hours a week as they desire.

Most of these pernicious practices of the labor-leader racketeers are carried on within the law, and as a Member of our national lawmaking body I have been attempting to correct the law ever since I became a Senator, and I hope the Senate will soon enact the bills which I have introduced on the subject.

Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker has come back from the very jaws of death, almost miraculously, to bring us his message from the battle-scarred areas where many of our brave soldiers and sailors lost their lives because they did not have enough weapons of war with which to protect themselves. One of the reasons why they did not have enough high-powered air bombers and other powerful weapons of war was that a sufficient number of such weapons had not been manufactured because of strikes, slow-downs, absenteeism, and a 40-hour week in our war factories. Captain Rickenbacker brings back the true facts from the lips of those who died and from the lips of those who still live and who in far-away places are fighting for freedom. They wonder why the Congress of the United States of America has not passed legislation that would stop this labor-leader racketeering and increase the production of the weapons they need so badly. Realizing, as does all America, the perilous experiences through which Captain Rickenbacker and the other members of his brave crew passed during those death-threatening days while on their little life rafts they floated day after day on the unruly waves of the ocean, where death was expected momentarily, it seems that it is only through an act of God that Captain Rickenbacker has been spared in order that he may use his knowledge to benefit our armed forces and this Nation in this grave crisis. I, for one, sincerely believe that Captain Rickenbacker is a godsend to this Nation at this time, and I should like very much to see him honored by some suitable citation.

I ask that a copy of Captain Rickenbacker's speech of February 18 on the subject I have been discussing be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In coming to you today, I am not unmindful of the exceptional honor, and I accept it not as an individual or personal tribute but as a tribute to a symbol to which I have contributed in my humble way.

The symbol that has made America great, inspired throughout the generations by our forefathers, and which has woven its way through the history of these great United States like a golden thread, comprised of imagination, individuality, self-reliance, initiative, and, last but not least, eternal but simple faith in the Supreme Being.

As all of you have either heard or read of my Pacific mission, there is little need of my dwelling on that subject, with the exception of stating that, after visiting with General MacArthur's boys in New Guinea, Port Moresby, Buna, and Gona, I returned to Australia, and then through the Fijis to Guadalcanal, a veritable hellhole, as the rainy season had just started.

Henderson Field runway is a metal strip that has been bombed and shelled for months and is also the airplane graveyard of the Pacific, not only for enemy planes but our own as well.

Dugouts were filled with mud and water. Men were working in jumpers without shoes or socks. Marines and soldiers were in the fox holes with billions of mosquitoes. Malaria was prevalent, as was diarrhea.

Here you will find a Catholic priest, Protestant preacher, or a Jewish rabbi, all preaching the simple faith to Catholics, Protestants, and Jews alike.

Oh, men and women of America, if you could only understand what our boys—your boys and mine—are doing in these hellholes throughout the Pacific and the burning sands of Africa, that your way of life may be preserved and the character that has made this Nation great may be carried on, you would not worry about 8 hours a day overtime or double time for Sundays and holidays, for this is a life-and-death struggle for the welfare of this Nation.

Without victory, social security, old-age pensions, wage-and-hour bills will mean nothing. France had her slow-down and sit-down strikes, had her social legislation—which I am not against—but they failed in the realization that without work and without producing something of value, they could not last. Today, they are serfs and slaves of Hitler's hordes. Millions of men, women, and children are starving. That goes for Holland, Belgium, the Scandinavian countries, Bataan, Corregidor, Hong Kong, and Singapore.

Accept your responsibilities with the privileges that you are enjoying. Remember patriotism without service is a hollow word. Make this land your land, so that it will be a livable place for your children as it has been for you, and make it the right kind of a place for your boys to return to. Recognize your obligation to the heritage you enjoy by being a citizen.

And to those 5,000,000 aliens who have failed to accept the responsibilities of citizenship of this Nation, but who came here to enjoy its fruits and privileges, apply tomorrow for your first papers and the responsibilities that go with them; if not, go back to where you came from.

Do not let these boys come back from their graves in these hellholes scattered throughout the Pacific and other parts of the world and from the depths of the seven seas—do not let them come back and plague you for having failed in your obligation on the home front to give them more and more of everything that is needed to hasten a final victory.

I know you realize that I have said—and I say again—we have in the past several years spent billions of dollars to destroy self-reliance, initiative, imagination, and individuality trying to plan the lives of 130,000,000 people by a superior few. Now we are spending billions to re-create self-reliance, initiative, imagination, and individuality.

For once you place our boys in a fox hole in the jungles of the Pacific, or on the desert sands of Africa, they are on their own. Once you have ordered our boys as commando troops to attack the enemy at night, they are on their own. Once you have dropped parachute troops behind enemy lines, day or night, they are on their own. Once you place a man in the cockpit of a plane and send him into the blue above, he is on his own. Once you put our boys into the tanks against the enemy, they are on their own. Once you put an officer into the front lines, leading a group of our boys into the face of enemy fire, he is on his own.

It is imagination, individuality, self-reliance, and initiative that are going to win this war for America, not only on the field of battle but on the home front.

For bear in mind that when this war is over—pray God it will be soon—there will be more rugged individualists come back to America from the four corners of the world than we ever had at any one time in our history, and I thank God for that.

As I have said before, if necessary to make us appreciate our duties, bring back the troops from the hellholes of the world, place them in the factories, take the war workers, particularly those single men without dependents from 18 to 38 years of age, and place them in the fox holes with the filth, vermin, diarrhea, malaria, and the Japanese, and I will guarantee you that our production will be increased, and much of it doubled, within 30 days.

We would have no more feather-bedding, no more slow-downs, no more restrictions on effort.

The perpetual slow-down in war industry caused by absenteeism, particularly in the aircraft industry where it exceeds an average of 10 percent, is probably the most flagrant abuse of our obligation since Pearl Harbor. In the Boeing factory alone the day following Christmas 26 percent of the employees were absentees, and our aviators in those hellholes are crying their eyes out for only a few more Flying Fortresses. In the Douglas plant there was an absenteeism of 11,000 employees the day after Christmas—a shocking and deplorable condition.

It is not the loss of individual man-hours that is so deadly, but the accumulated loss of thousands of hours on the production line of other employees caused by individual absenteeism which, during the past year, has run well into hundreds of millions of man-hours.

Cut this absenteeism in half and our fighting forces throughout the world will be grateful, as it will add sufficient planes and parts and other weapons for their use to hasten final victory and save the lives of untold thousands of our boys.

There is no absenteeism in the fox holes in the jungles of the Pacific or the burning sands of Africa, for if attempted there, they would get a bayonet in their bellies from their buddies.

We hear a lot nowadays about the shortage of manpower hours. It is not the shortage of manpower hours that is slowing up the badly needed production of our war weapons and supplies. No. But it is the shortage of productive manpower hours, for again none of us are producing so much that we cannot—all of us—produce a little more.

There are still millions of old men and middle-aged women, unemployed by war industries, who would gladly and conscientiously contribute, if given an opportunity.

Give us back that old-fashioned American incentive and love of country, and we will produce enough war weapons to turn heaven and hell upside down on the heads of Mussolini, Hitler, and Tojo. For experienced production men—and thank God we have many—know from actual results that those manufacturers who have retained the "incentive" plan report that their experiences under actual production conditions prove to them that they would lose 50 percent effectiveness if their employees were on the straight 40-hour week and hourly rate.

Further, these same manufacturers also report a noticeably lower absenteeism in their plants than in plants where only hourly rate men are employed.

Certainly, the experience of years of "know how" by men who have been honest with labor should be worth listening to in this country's need of productive manpower hours.

Let our labor leaders become leaders in fact as well as name and take advantage of the great opportunity that is theirs and ask Congress to repeal, for the duration only, that section covering the weekly hours of the wage-and-hour law, but use the present hourly rate as a basis for pay or wages.

For, again, experience has proven that manufacturers in many industries who are operating on the "incentive" plan are showing a conservative increase in production per manpower hour of at least 33⅓ percent over those operating under the wage-and-hour law.

This would give us an increase of 5,500,000 extra workers among the 16,500,000 now employed in manufacturing on a 48-hour week without overtime. This increase in productive manpower hours would not only take care of the estimated 2,100,000 employees that will be needed to take care of increased war production, but would leave free 3,400,000 men now on the pay rolls in manufacturing for farms or other needed essential services.

Why should not our Congress show the common sense and intestinal fortitude now and clarify our labor laws so that millions of innocent men and women will have the same protection from our Government as do the racketeers?

Let America come back to the fundamentals that made it great. Let us all be realists instead of emotionalists, sentimentalists, or selfish, greedy human beings in this hour of our country's need.

Or must we wait until hundreds of thousands of the cream of our youth—sons, brothers, husbands, and fathers—have been slaughtered and wrecked—mentally or physically—before we recognize our duty?

Yes, I am opposed to overtime pay for a 48-hour week during this life-and-death struggle. In times like these, I do not approve of overtime pay for a 48-hour week with present high wages, except for those men in the foxholes, swamps, jungles, deserts, and the frozen north of the Aleutians and Iceland, for they are the men making the supreme sacrifice. For there is little reason why those of us back home should not expend every effort and energy—if not for our boys in uniform then, at least, to save our own skins.

Give the millions of honest men and women in this country an opportunity to do their best—they ask no more.

And to the labor leaders who are so prone to criticize so feebly, I say petition your Government for the privilege of flying to the hell-holes of the Pacific and the battlefields of North Africa, and see for yourselves as I have—then and then alone will I listen to you—for I have earned my right to citizenship.

And to those few scuministic, synthetic Communists in labor, commerce, and government, who are so prone to smear, I say go back to Russia where you will find millions of men and women willing to die and starve for their country in turning Hitler's hordes from their land—there you will find how transparent you are.

Or better yet, those of military age, get into Uncle Sam's uniform and pay your share of the obligation for the privileges you are enjoying—go to the hell-holes of the Pacific or the battlefields of north Africa and learn to use bayonets on the Germans, Italians, and the Japs, where your smearing will do some good.

And while I am on the subject, I noticed a few days ago the announcement of the declaration of the War Manpower Commission to 29 occupational groups that even though they may be fathers of 5 or 6 children, they must find war important jobs by spring or face induction.

Here again I am shocked to find that our officials in Washington have omitted challenging a group known more commonly as labor racketeers of the "graft" age, and I spell it with a "G" and not a "D".

And I reiterate again, that our Congress should see fit to introduce and pass such legislation, to first—upon his release or discharge, any member of our armed forces can be employed by any employer without having to join any organized labor unions.

Second—upon his employment, he shall have equal voting rights with any other employee in any union, and any employee and management plan of the employer.

Third—his seniority in relation to other employees of draft age should date as of the day he enlisted or was inducted into this country's service.

I definitely feel that our situation here at home is most serious and that by such legislation our Congress could free honest labor from those racketeers and parasites that are right now hindering the effort of our workers to do the best they can to win this war. Such legislation will insure all the members of our services an equal opportunity right now as well as after this war is over with those who stayed at home in industry.

What better bonus could we give our service men than the elimination of their having to buy the right to work in their own country on their release or discharge from the service.

Why should they have to pay exorbitant membership fees demanded by those unions working under a closed shop agreement—and what better bonus could we give them than to eliminate their having to pay dues for the privilege of keeping their jobs?

Briefly, why shouldn't a man's honorable discharge or release from the service of his country be all he would henceforth need as a union card when he returns to work for himself and his family after having worked for all of us so willingly and risked his life in our behalf?

Why could we not use the splendid abilities of our local selective-service boards to draft those men needed by our war industry or our farmers?

Let these men be sent to Army or Navy schools and there let them be taught an agricultural or industrial skill in the same way that their younger and unmarried contemporaries are being taught a skill of war. These men could then be released to the farm or to industry and under this legislation they would not have to join any labor union.

They would be men who, I believe, would have a sobering effect on those malcontents who seem to think it their business to foment strikes and discontent. These men will have served their country through the Army or the Navy and will be able to tell their children that they did their bit, even though their job was only to make the implements at home that were shipped to those serving at the other end of the supply lines, in battle.

These men could replace those single men now in essential industry. It would be better to have a man with a family, working at home in industry with his family than to have him drafted for combat service and have our Government liable for the support of his family. He could earn the wages of industry and in this way make a fairer distribution of the costs of this war.

With the end of the war, they could be given honorable discharges the same as those who were in combat and make them feel that they had served their country to the best of their ability. For there will be millions of young men returning home who have never had a job or who have never been forced to pay tribute to men who never did an honest day's work in their lives.

We all must realize that this war we are fighting is a total war. It is a war in which all of us can get hurt—for which all of us will have to pay, and in which all of us will have to work and fight in order for all of us to win.

In many ways a man can acquire a record of his service which, although it might not be all in one place and quite informal, is nonetheless a record. It is quite different with such records when a man enters the service of his country.

The armed services take no chances in such a haphazard means of recording his deeds or misdeeds. Just as soon as he gets his uniform, he acquires what is known as his service record.

In our Army, this record of the service that a man performs for his country is inscribed in a little white book that has 24 pages. These pages provide for the detailing of his whole history while in the service of his Nation.

Thus, in these entries in his service record, one finds the story of his transfers, promotions, leaves, illnesses, wounds, his deeds of valor or indiscretion, behavior, and promotion or demotion of rank. They are all duly recorded for his country, himself, and for posterity. It is shown just what he did for his country and in the fighting for the safeguarding of those who, he had every reason to expect, were working just as hard for him as he was fighting and risking his life for them.

Since this war is a total war in which all of us have a definite responsibility in working side by side with those fighting for us—then I do think we civilians at home should be proud to have records kept of our services for our fighting men in the same manner that records are kept of their service for us.

All of us would be proud to have such a record—whether a Cub Scout or an invalid in a wheel chair—with which we could prove that we had acquitted ourselves honorably in this fight.

Save the Nation for these boys when they return because by our acts and efforts will they judge us.

Yes, of course, buy bonds, buy to the limit, if you believe in this land. Buy a stake in its future so that when this horrible catastrophe is over you will not be the first one crying for relief.

Yes, I know I have been accused of being the representative of the National Association of Manufacturers, the automotive industry, the American First Committee, and even accused of being a Fascist. Frankly and sincerely, I represent no person or persons, group or groups, color or creed, nor have I any political ambitions—I speak for myself alone, but echo the sentiments of millions.

And again, I frankly state that I much prefer to break bread with Henry Ford, the Fisher Bros., the K. T. Kellars of Chrysler, and the Charlie Ketterings of General Motors, for here are men who have come from the soil and given the world one of the greatest gifts humanity has ever received in history—the automobile.

Yes, I would rather sit down with these men than with those who are living in the laps of luxury at the expense of the sweat and toil of millions of honest men and women.

Let us give these millions of young men inducted into the uniform of these great United States an opportunity on their return to again join the union of Americanism.

And to Congress I say again, face the facts and show the traditional American intestinal fortitude by legislating this cancerous element from our midst. Why should these racketeers be immune from reporting their incomes or paying taxes on their tributes from the millions? Why should our Congress not bring about compulsory incorporation, public accounting of their funds, and forbid political contributions from their ill-gotten gains if they are honest in their intentions?

No, I am not a labor hater. I believe in honest labor unions who are doing their darndest to turn out the weapons we need. I have been laboring for 40-odd years—since I was 12 years of age in many lines of endeavor. I come from humble parents. I know the value of honest labor. I have served labor as well as employer.

And I know just how serious the situation is from the thousands of letters I have received from men and women in many industries from all parts of the United States—both union and nonunion—who have urged and pleaded that I bring the facts before the public before it is too late.

And to those millions of honest men and women war workers goes my heartfelt thanks—but to those whom the shoe fits—I say wear it.

For there is nothing of material value that any of you or anybody has on the face of this globe that I want—with the exception of 10 more years of life with my mental and physical faculties to help preserve the freedom and standards of living dedicated to us by our forefathers for our children and our soldiers when they come back—and only God can give me that.

MERGER OF TELEGRAPH COMPANIES—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, at the session last Thursday I explained in some detail the conference report on Senate bill 158, the telegraph merger bill. Since that time I have been asked whether the provisions of subsections (f) (2) and (f) (7) are broad enough to permit discharge, for reasons other than those of consolidation and merger, of employees who were hired after March 1, 1941. I wish to state now that it is my opinion, and, I am sure, the opinion of the other conferees on the part of the Senate, that these provisions are interpreted by us to mean that such junior employees are protected against discharge only for the period specified in (f) (2) and then only for causes arising out of merger; they are not meant to require the employer to continue the employment of such employees when their services would no longer be required due to a change in economic conditions, resulting in a drop in business.

At this time I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on Senate bill 158.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will not the Senator postpone his motion until the routine morning business shall have been concluded?

Mr. McFARLAND. I am willing to do that.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE WAR EFFORT BY EAST AURORA, N. Y., STUDENTS

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, the patriotic endeavors of the high-school students of East Aurora, N. Y., have caused widespread and favorable comment. In fact, I have in my hand an article from the New York Times commending the school children of that village for their exemplary conduct in the sale of bonds and in the purchase of airplanes. The article proceeds to explain that the students sold $50,000 of war bonds to aid in buying a Bell Airacobra for the Army Air Forces, and that three planes flew over the village in honor of their accomplishment.

Within a few hours afterward the superintendent of schools notified the manufacturer of the aircraft that the children had raised a sufficient sum of money to buy a second plane, and the article proceeds to state that they are now preparing in a substantial way to make the third purchase.

I should like to have the article commendatory of the activities of these young people inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PUPILS BOUGHT TWO PLANES—EAST AURORA YOUNGSTERS ARE NOW SELLING BONDS FOR A THIRD

BUFFALO, February 20.—It took East Aurora school students more than a year to sell $50,000 in War bonds to buy a Bell Airacobra for the Army Air Forces, but today they bought a second and the sum represented less than 2 hours of bond selling.

The first plane was turned over to Maj. Milo H. Miller at Bell Aircraft Corporation January 23. As a reward, he arranged for three planes to fly over East Aurora January 29.

Within 2 hours after the flight the superintendent of schools, Walter L. Bumgardner, called the major to tell him enough bonds had been sold to buy another Airacobra.

Today student representatives presented the check to Lawrence D. Bell, president of the aircraft firm, and informed him they had sold $19,000 in bonds toward a third plane.

The planes are marked with the East Aurora schools' "blue devil" astride a bomb.

ADDITIONAL ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 49, Senate bill 707, to provide for the appointment of an additional Assistant Attorney General. For the information of the Senate I wish to say that the Committee on the Judiciary considered this measure and reported it unanimously. The bill simply provides for the appointment of an additional Assistant Attorney General. It seems that until 1933 there were six Assistant Attorneys General, each one heading a division or a branch of the Department of Justice, and being responsible for that division, and reporting directly to the Attorney General, but on June 16, 1933, the number was reduced to five.

The Attorney General points out that a new division has been created since that time, called the War Division, having jurisdiction of all prosecutions and similar matters relating to the war, but that there is no Assistant Attorney General to head that Division because of the reduction of the number to five. He also points out that there will be no additional expense incurred, in that the Assistant Attorney General will not draw any more salary than do the classified attorneys now in the Department who are performing this work. The chief reason for wanting an additional Assistant Attorney General is that he may head a number of divisions which are now more or less without any cohesion. He will be head of all those divisions and responsible to the Attorney General, and will report directly to the Attorney General.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EASTLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. Am I correct in my understanding that the Senator from Texas said that the bill has been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; unanimously.

Mr. WHITE. Is the bill on the calendar?

Mr. CONNALLY. The bill is on the calendar. It has the unanimous report of the Committee on the Judiciary. This morning I consulted prominent Members on the Republican side of the Chamber about the bill, and there is no objection on their part to the Senate proceeding to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], the distinguished minority leader, sent word to me this morning that because of a slight indisposition he will not be here today, and he hoped that the calendar would not be called today. The bill in question is on the calendar. I do not regard consideration and passage of the bill as being contrary to the wish expressed by the Senator from Oregon with respect to calling the calendar. When the Senator from Oregon is again present, if he should have a reason for requesting reconsideration of the action of the Senate on the bill, which I doubt he will have, it will be entirely agreeable to me to have the action reconsidered.

Mr. CONNALLY. I should say to the Senator from Kentucky that I will be very glad to accede to any motion of that kind because I do not care to inconvenience the Senator from Oregon. I have the highest respect and admiration for him, and I would not do anything contrary to his views in his absence. When he returns to the Chamber, if he wants the action on the bill reconsidered, so far as I am concerned, I shall cheerfully agree to such a request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 707) to provide for the appointment of an additional Assistant Attorney General was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 348 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., title 5, sec. 295), be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"There shall be in the Department of Justice six officers, learned in the law, called the Assistant Attorneys General, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall assist the Attorney General and Solicitor General in the performance of their duties."

MERGER OF TELEGRAPH COMPANIES—CONFERENCE REPORT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The routine morning business is concluded.

Mr. MCFARLAND. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on Senate bill 158, which was presented and printed in the RECORD on last Thursday, February 18.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arizona that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on Senate bill 158.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 158) to amend the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, to permit consolidations and mergers of domestic telegraph carriers, and for other purposes.

Mr. MCFARLAND. Mr. President, I move that the conference report be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I wish the RECORD to show that I am opposed to the adoption of the conference report. I have in my hand a letter dated February 13 from one of the employees of the Postal Telegraph Co., which recalls to mind what was taking place a few years ago in this country before the Postal Telegraph Co. was organized. The writer says:

It is with many misgivings that I view the impending merger of the two land telegraph companies, the Western Union and Postal Telegraph. The misgivings are as to what sort of service the American public will get once Western Union has the field to itself. Years ago Postal Telegraph had on display in all of its offices the slogan "Did you ever stop to consider what the telegraph service was before Postal entered the field?"

Mr. President, if the conference report shall be adopted it will mean that we are creating a monopoly in this country, so far as the telegraph service is concerned. It will mean that the people are going to be at the mercy of this monopoly.

I have a further objection to adoption of the report. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. MCFARLAND] said on Thursday last, as it appears on page 1094 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—

It is true that Postal preferred stock, the senior security of the present landline company, has risen from $9 a share to $19 or $20. However, I desire to point out the fact that there is no way of determining at this time what the value of this security will be in the event of a merger. We all know that securities fluctuate frequently on the market upon a mere suspicion or hope that their value will be increased. I, for one, am not guided or interested by what the people in Wall Street do in this regard.

Mr. President, a few days ago the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] submitted to the Senate a list of the preferred stockholders of the Postal Telegraph Co. That list shows that during the few weeks this matter has been under consideration in Congress the value of the preferred stock held by a few of those whose names appear in the list has risen in the amount of $1,357,060. In other words, we find in the list a group of Wall Street operators who would benefit by this merger to that extent. I ask that the list be printed in the RECORD in this connection as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I do not know who the Wall Street operators are. One of those on the list is Fahnestock & Co., No. 1 Wall Street, New York, which has 5,225 shares of preferred stock. The stock has already gone up in value $10 per share, so that company has made a profit of $50,000. Another concern has over 10,000 shares of the preferred stock.

If that stock were sold today that company would have a profit of $100,000. If the Western Union takes over the Postal Telegraph Co., and the increase in the value of the preferred stock of the Postal amounts to two million dollars or three million dollars, whatever it may be, ultimately those who hold the stock will appear before the appropriate commission asking for telegraph rates based upon what this stock has cost them, and asking that the American public pay rates based upon what they had to pay for the stock of this company.

Not only that, but I believe that if the proposed merger should become effective the preferred stock would rise in value even more rapidly than it has risen up to the present time. Fundamentally, Mr. President, I cannot see why the Senate should be asked to pass upon the merger of two telegraph companies, among all the enterprises in the country. The proponents of the measure could just as well ask us to pass upon the merger of any two companies engaged in the manufacture of war materials. They could just as well ask for the merger of two telephone companies. There would be as much logic in such a request as there is in the one which has been made with reference to the merger of two telegraph companies. I think we are asked to embark upon a course which would be injurious to the country.

Mr. McFARLAND. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. McFARLAND. Does not the Senator know that legislation has already been enacted permitting telephone companies to merge?

Mr. LANGER. Yes; I agree that that is true. At the time such legislation was enacted I was not a Member of the Senate, and was not in a position to object. This is the first time since I became a Member of the Senate that a proposed merger of this nature has come before the Senate, and I desire to urge my emphatic protest against it.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I have been requested by the distinguished Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HAWKES], to read to the Senate a statement in relation to the conference report. It will require about 5 minutes.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR HAWKES

1. The provisions protecting the employees of any merged company that occurs under this act should not be any more exacting on the merged companies than the provisions contained in the amendment of 1940 to the Interstate Commerce Act authorizing the consolidation and merger of railroads. The merged company should not be compelled to keep employees, who under ordinary conditions, could be dismissed by either of the companies merging. The purpose of the act should be to protect only employees who might be discharged as the result of the merger itself. The United States needs manpower right now and, while I am definitely in favor of reasonable protection of the employees who were on the pay roll of these two companies on March 1, 1941, or prior thereto, to an extent that will allow them the opportunity of providing themselves with other employment if their services are no longer required by the merged company, I do not believe the protection should go to the point of guaranteeing employment to those who would have been released in any event regardless of the merger.

2. If we are to preserve the right of private industry to manage its own affairs, restricted only by the Government insofar as it is necessary for the protection of the rights of the people as a whole, then the company management should have the right to make extensions to its property which in its opinion are desired and required for service to the people of the United States.

3. I recognize that this act is said to be permissive and not compulsory, but the whole purpose of the act is to bring about a merger to correct a condition that exists. The question involved is whether the Government should control private industry or whether private industry should be permitted to control itself in such ways that give due consideration to the public interest. This point can all be summed up in saying that the people of the United States must decide whether they wish to preserve the fair rights of private ownership and operation or desire to have, at first, certain private institutions controlled and directed by Federal agencies, which, in my opinion, will ultimately lead to the control and direction of all private industry by the Government.

4. I believe the provision in section 2, which compels the domestic telegraph carriers to divest themselves of international telegraph operations with due diligence on a consideration basis which, in the opinion of the Federal Communications Commission, is fair, is an unsound provision to be incorporated in this bill. I might ask, who is going to buy these cable lines, except some other company that is precluded from buying them under the Sherman Anti-Trust Act? The answer to that might be that the Government, itself, will buy the cable lines. I do not believe the people wish to have private industry carved up into sections, part of which are Government-owned and controlling in their effect upon private industry.

I am unavoidably absent from the Senate today, but for the above reasons, if present, I would record my vote against the adoption of the conference report, but if these points could be cleared up, I would record my vote in favor of the conference report.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, I do not rise under any delusion that anything I may say will prevent the acceptance of the conference report or prevent the enactment of the proposed legislation now under consideration. I merely desire to reiterate what I have said before, namely, that, in my opinion, the proposed legislation is unsound, unwise, and that it falls distinctly within the category of special-privilege legislation.

The proposed legislation would do three things: It would guarantee 4 years of employment to men who are employed by the Postal Telegraph Co. and who, for the most part, seem to be opposed to the legislation at a time when they are better able to obtain work than they will be 4 years from now.

It would recover a considerable percentage of the investment which the original investors in the Postal Telegraph & Cable Co. made years ago, and would enable approximately 30 percent of the present stockholders to reap a speculative profit.

I cannot consider the proposed legislation, Mr. President, without looking at the calendar and seeing Calendar No. 32, Senate bill 403, a bill for the relief of certain claimants who suffered losses and sustained damages as a result of the campaign carried out by the Federal Government for the eradication of the Mediterranean fruitfly in the State of Florida. A group of farmers in the State of Florida have sustained great loss through absolutely no fault of their own. Yet the Senate has blocked the passage of legislation to enable them to recover their losses, and at the same time has hurried through, as though it had to be done in a minute, the proposed legislation for the benefit of New York bankers and brokers who, with their clients, hold most of the stock of the Postal Telegraph Co.

Mr. President, I am opposed to any legislation of this nature, which takes from all the people for the benefit of a few, unless those few are needy and in distress. As I look over the list of stockholders of the Postal Telegraph Co. I seriously doubt that any of them are needy and in distress today. When legislation of this nature is proposed I desire to hit it as often and hard as I can.

Mr. President, on the question of the adoption of the conference report, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I have hoped the proposed legislation would pass without further delay, but if there is to be a yea-and-nay vote, I wish to speak briefly upon the situation.

This legislation has had as long and as thoughtful study as any with which I have been familiar during my legislative service. An appropriate committee of this body, the Committee on Interstate Commerce, conducted long and laborious hearings and later gave thoughtful consideration to the information placed before it at the hearings. Legislation was finally drafted which had the approval of the committee. I believe it had the unanimous approval of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate, and in due course it was passed by the Senate. It went to the other House and there the corresponding committee studied the proposed legislation and reported it to the House. The House then gave the legislation its blessing.

The House struck out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill and wrote an amendment, so when the bill went to conference the entire subject matter of this legislation was before the conferees of the Senate and the House. Although the House committee and the House itself struck out all after the enacting clause and wrote a new bill, that bill contained chiefly changes in form and in detail rather than in the basic principles of the bill as it passed the Senate. I believe it entirely truthful to say that the House bill followed the basic purposes and concepts of the Senate bill.

Mr. President, there are groups who are interested in the legislation which is now before us. There are the telegraph companies involved. I believe we are warranted in saying that the Postal Telegraph Co. and the Western Union Telegraph Co. look with approval upon the passage of the legislation, although they may be motivated by different considerations. I apprehend that the Postal Telegraph Co. desires the passage of the legislation because it sees in it an alternative to the bankruptcy of the Postal Co. and the dissipation of the resources of that company through the procedure of a bankruptcy court.

I understand also that the Western Union is in favor of the legislation. I do not know that it has said so in specific terms, but I suspect that it sees in it an alternative to the assumption by the Government of the United States of the operations of the Postal Telegraph Co. and the Postal Company's services and facilities operated in competition with a private company. I do not blame the Western Union Co. at all for its anxiety because of this possibility.

Labor is involved, and is interested in the pending report.

Mr. President, I believe the sound thinkers in the labor organizations of the country approve the measure as it now stands; but whether they approve it or not they should approve it because it writes for labor a charter not found elsewhere in legislation enacted by Congress.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TUNNELL in the chair). Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. Does what the Senator said mean that the measure would establish a precedent for labor in matters like the one dealt with by it?

Mr. WHITE. There is no other situation like it. In the pending measure we guarantee that, after the merger, labor employed before March 1941 shall continue to have employment for a period at least equal in time to the period during which it was employed by the constituent companies before the merger, with a maximum of 4 years' time. In my view there is no comparable situation. Something has been said about what we have done for railroad labor, and the question is asked why we should do more for the telegraph employees than has been done for railroad employees. I think there is a very basic difference which furnishes a convicing reason for the greater liberality on our part for the telegraph company labor. When a railroad line is abandoned or when its services are curtailed employees affected can go to a hundred other railroads in the country seeking employment. When a corresponding change occurs with reference to a telegraph company, when the Postal Telegraph Co. disappears, there is just one place where the man who has given his life's services to the telegraph industry can go for employment, and that is to the merged company which it is proposed to set up. Because of that narrow market for telegraph labor I think we are justified in what I concede is liberality.

Then, Mr. President, the Government of the United States is interested in the measure. We have in the RECORD the approval of the President of the United States of its purpose and general principles. The Signal Corps of the War Department has asked for enactment of the measure. The communications authorities of the Navy Department have asked for enactment of the measure, and so has the Federal Communications Commission, having general authority and general jurisdiction over all communications facilities of the country. Are we to deny recognition to those voices from the governmental authorities of the country?

But, over and beyond all that, I think that the people of the United States are interested in the measure. They are interested in communications service; and the overwhelming weight of authority before the committee and before the Senate is that by permitting the merger we shall preserve for the people of the United States a better telegraph service than we shall find under any of the alternatives which face us at this time.

So, Mr. President, because I think that all those groups are entitled to consideration, and because I think that their combined voices should be persuasive with the Senate, I express the hope that the conference report will be agreed to by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report. On that question the yeas and nays have been demanded. Is there a sufficient second?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. AIKEN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

AGRICULTURAL LABOR—DEFERMENT FROM MILITARY SERVICE

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, on the 18th of February I introduced two bills, one relating to deferment from military service, and the other relief of agricultural labor. After the bills were introduced I received letters from three Members of the Senate expressing willingness to join as cosponsors of the bills, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM], whose communications came in just a little too late to have them included as cosponsors. I ask unanimous consent that their names appear in the permanent RECORD as cosponsors of each of the bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

CONDITION OF SMALL BUSINESSES

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, when the President, in effect, agreed to a truce with big business 2 years ago, we knew it was a sort of compromise that only the prospect of war could enforce upon him; and he came to it only after a year of vain appeal to the patriotism of big business leadership to throw its full support behind the preparedness program.

Many believed that it was a bitter bargain, and saw in it even then the disturbing prospect that the history of World War No. 1 might repeat itself. But I doubt whether anyone could have foretold what the compromise would provoke.

A decade ago his leadership brought to this land a new day for the common man, for the little operator, for small business. The reforms brought about were so great that the New Deal has been called a bloodless revolution.

From what I see about me now, from evidence coming to me through the inquiries of the Small Business Committee and from various other quarters, from the recent discussions which have occurred on this floor, the conviction grows more deeply on me that we are in the grip of a reactionary change, which, if unchecked, will make any excesses of the New Deal pale into insignificance in the backward lengths to which it may go and which could conceivably bring the final extermination of traditional democracy in this country.

This change comes at a time of great stress, when the emergencies of an unprecedented war demand unprecedented experiments and entail unprecedented dislocations; when the consideration of time supersedes all cost, and that of production, all question of means. It is a beclouded scene, one in which the pain of a treasonable wound may be easily confused with the stricture of needed sacrifice, one in which the stern orders of war's necessity may ride double with bureaucratic tyranny and stupidity.

Our condition is made difficult, and many of us are wont to cry out against the symptoms, rather than the disease; yet I feel sure there is no Member of the Senate who does not realize that free enterprise in this country has been dealt a deadly blow, incident to the struggle against the enemy beyond our gates.

We have been disturbed here recently by a most alarming picture of the shift in the production ratio between big business and small business. It has been admitted that 70 percent of all war contracts is in the hands of 100 giant concerns, and the share of small business in the war program, while its size may be uncertain, is, I think, without question far out of proportion to what it should be and must be if small business is to survive this war.

We have been presented the alarming picture in silhouette, and we know that the greater portion of the production shift is the result of the direct action of our Government in placing war contracts with big business. But that does not present the full view. Though not so obvious, an agency-by-agency, bureau-by-bureau close-up of this all-pervasive bureaucracy is no less disturbing. It was this shift I had in mind when I spoke of the reactionary change in the character of our Government.

There is an old saying that more than 80 percent of any law lies in its administration. That saw may have belonged to the field of emphatic half-truths once, but today it is an understatement of literal fact. Never before in our history has government been so much the will of men, as opposed to the check and guaranty of laws; never before have our fates, our every right, so depended on the liver condition, the emotional processes, the prejudices, the bent of mind, the character of past experience, and the special interests of governors, big and little. Of such is the unholy kingdom of bureaucracy.

Bureaucracy, itself, I regard to be a fungus growth on the body politic, but it is the character of this bureaucracy about which I wish to speak.

When this bureaucratic element, which I believe to be so inimical to our traditional democracy, began to insinuate itself into the wartime executive branch 2 years ago, few of us discerned the intent or extent of the undertaking. Since the inquiries of the Small Business Committee began, I think this intent has been growing increasingly clear to us. Where we have been able to lift the camouflaging vestments of official title here and there, its extent is seen to prevail alarmingly.

Mr. President, the unwholesome intimacy of big business with our war agencies and the arrogant attitude of some agency bureaucrats toward small business was revealed in the testimony of J. Raymond Walsh, C. I. O. research director, before the Small Business Committee shortly before Christmas. Walsh testified that W. P. B. was continuing with the construction of the $38,000,000 armor-plate plant for the Carnegie-Illinois Steel Co., subsidiary of United States Steel, at Gary, Ind., despite the traffic congestion and labor shortage at that place, despite the large use this would make of critical materials, despite the fact that there were a number of virtually idle small steel companies crying for armor-plate contracts, and despite the fine record of production of the Standard Steel Pool, a group of small independents, who had surpassed the big companies in production, and who would suffer vitally by the projected shift of production to the new plant under United States Steel.

Mr. Walsh, when comparing the methods in use for fabricating steel, pointed out that the independents of the pool were using a process which required no nickel and very little molybdenum, both of which are highly critical materials, while the two "big business" companies of the industry were processing in a way that required more molybdenum and a very considerable amount of nickel—some 280 pounds per tank, which would build four tank engines, eight tank transmissions, seven airplane motors. He said there was no demand from W. P. B. that Big Steel drop nickel from its formula, but instead that it be given a subsidy at the expense of the independents to continue the use of this process.

This policy seems neither in the interest of the war program, nor in any degree fair to the independents, and is a concrete example of how smaller concerns are ignored and big business preferred.

In describing this strange course of action, Mr. Walsh submitted a revealing bit of information. He said:

> There may be a direct relationship between this (the use of nickel by Big Steel) and the employment in the Tank and Combat Vehicle Section of the Ordnance Division of the War Department of the son-in-law (Mr. Reuel E. Warriner) of Mr. R. C. Stanley, president of the International Nickel Co., who is a member of the board of directors of the United States Steel Corporation.

There is a case where small business may see the whites of their eyes.

But is this a rare accident of circumstances; is it a coincidence? Let us turn to the field of tire manufacture. As chairman of the Agriculture Subcommittee on the use of cotton fabric in tires, I, too, have run afoul of such strangely accidental circumstances.

I am sure that many Senators know of the effort to influence the Army Ordnance Division to require the use of rayon fabric in the production of all synthetic rubber tires, and to give rayon preference in the manufacture of natural rubber tires, also to the exclusion of cotton.

Unlike cotton, rayon has to be treated with a solution of latex before rubber will adhere to it, and practically all the machinery for this treatment is in the hands of the Big Four tire companies, so that only these companies were and are able to make any substantial quantity of tires in which rayon is specified.

For months the subcommittee has been insisting on fair competitive tests for cotton fabric. Long before the conclusion of these tests, which are still in progress, and I suppose foreshadowing the inevitable end, W. P. B. authorized another increase in the high tenacity rayon capacity of 50,000,000 pounds annually. More than 8,000,000 pounds of critical materials, such as steel, copper, and aluminum, are being used in the rayon-expansion program, all at Government expense. Substantially all this program is concentrated in the hands of the two largest rayon companies. Obviously the rayon program is placing the small tire companies at a very distinct additional disadvantage.

The subcommittee has not as yet had officially submitted to it a copy of the report of the Automotive Engineers Ordnance Advisory Committee, under whose supervision the tests of rayon and cotton fabric tires have been made. However, I have been advised that the committee will recommend that all standard size and larger tires made of synthetic compounds for the Army be made of rayon and that the natural rubber tires of these sizes also be made of rayon insofar as the supply of rayon makes this possible.

This recommendation will be made despite the report we have had that, in the test made at El Centro, Calif., which is one of the testing points, the tires making the best record there were synthetic rubber and cotton cord tires manufactured by Armstrong Tire & Rubber

Co., of Natchez, Miss., a small producer, Again, from Normoyle, Tex.—the other point of reported testing—the unofficial advice we have received is that the General Tire Co.'s standard size synthetic rubber tires showed performance as between rayon and cotton cord to be about equal.

If Mr. Jeffers, the Rubber Administrator, follows the rayon recommendation of the committee every small tire manufacturer will be crippled. But that is not half the story. It will throttle a host of cotton farmers of the South, who, also, are small businessmen and the foundation of traditional democracy, for tire fabric constitutes the largest single domestic market for cotton in this country.

Most Senators are familiar with the story of economic subjugation of the South which Eastern corporate industry and big business control has effected through adverse freight rates, a subjugation which has prevented the South from developing industrially, and has forced a part of it, through undernourished years, to rely largely on the single-crop cotton culture in order to exist at all. Now this fraternity of industrial behemoths of the East proposes to do further injury to the South's chief money crop, and reduce its market.

Confronted with this apparent partiality for rayon, in the face of the inevitably serious dislocation to our existing economy, I can find only one explanation to submit.

The members of the aforementioned advisory committee are: Messrs. Elliott and Boyle, Goodrich Rubber Co.; Messrs. Lyon and Darrow, Firestone Tire & Rubber Co.; Mr. Pushee, General Tire & Rubber Co.; Messrs. Shivley, McCarty, and Sohl, Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co.; Messrs. Soulen and Orr, Mansfield Tire & Rubber Co.; Mr. Martin, United States Rubber Co.; Capt. J. J. Robson, United States Army Ordnance, formerly of Firestone.

This list reads like the register of America's corporate rubber rajahs, even including the United States Army's representation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCRUGHAM in the chair). Does the junior Senator from Tennessee yield to his colleague?

Mr. STEWART. I am glad to yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Do all the gentlemen to whom the Senator makes reference work in the rubber agency?

Mr. STEWART. I do not know how much time they devote to such duties as they might have in Washington, but they are members of the advisory committee, who, as I understand, meet at stated times and receive and pass upon the progress reports of the tests.

Mr. McKELLAR. Are they dollar-a-year men?

Mr. STEWART. I am not sure whether this group consists of dollar-a-year men. My colleague will recall that when the first hearing was held there were in attendance a group of Senators from the cotton-producing States, as well as a representative of the Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. who was a so-called dollar-a-year man. At least, he was loaned by Firestone, probably to the Rubber Administrator, or to some department of the W. P. B. I believe he or someone else stated on that occasion that the persons comprising this committee were not dollar-a-year men but served in an advisory capacity, coming to Washington only at infrequent intervals.

Mr. McKELLAR. Do they belong to the class of employees who receive mileage, hotel expenses, and a per diem of $23 a day while they are working for the Government?

Mr. STEWART. I do not have information on that point. I am sorry I cannot advise the distinguished Senator in that regard.

Mr. McKELLAR. Were any of them appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, as required by the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. STEWART. I believe not. It is my understanding that they are merely sent here to serve in an advisory capacity. As I say, they come only at infrequent intervals. I do not believe they are considered to be employees, or even dollar-a-year men. They advise with the United States Army, with the Rubber Administrator, and with those who are charged with the responsibility of determining whether or not cotton or rayon is better for the construction of tires which the Army will later purchase.

Mr. McKELLAR. A rather interesting situation arose a few days ago in the hearings on one of the bills being considered by the Appropriations Committee of the Senate.

A very small organization had asked for quite a large sum of travel pay. The representative of that organization was asked by the committee how many men used the travel pay. I believe it finally developed that only one man in the whole bureau was using the fund. The witness was asked, "How could you spend $11,000 travel pay on one man?"

I see the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK], who is a member of the committee and who, I believe, was present at the time, sitting in the Chamber. He can verify my statement or correct me if I am mistaken.

The gentleman who was testifying for this particular bureau very candidly stated that the arrangement was as follows: Whenever the bureau, or any of its members, felt that it was wise to call in experts for consultation, they were called in at Government expense, including whatever travel pay might be necessary going and coming. The Government paid the hotel expenses in Washington, and paid the experts, or consultants, $23 a day, if I correctly recall the sum, for the time they were in Washington and working. It was also stated that some of them worked for only a few days, while others worked as long as 6 months, or possibly even longer.

In other words, under the term "travel pay" a number of consultant employees of the Government were brought here at the expense of the Government. In addition to traveling expenses, the Government paid the experts a per diem and their hotel expenses.

I see the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MAYBANK] rising. I ask him if I am correct in my recollection.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee is absolutely correct. As I understand in some of the departments "travel pay" was used to hire so-called experts as the Senator has stated.

With reference to the amount paid, I believe the Senator is also correct. In one instance we were told that the bureau brought a number of lawyers to Washington. I asked the bureau representative how much the experts had been paid, and I understood that the amount would be furnished later, and we did not receive an answer at the time.

Mr. McKELLAR. I refer to the situaton to show the tendency on the part of the bureaus to conceal the number of employees by paying their salaries and expenses under the term "travel pay."

Last year the Government spent approximately $147,000,000 for travel pay alone. I think such a situation should make Senators pause before we continue an item which is used so promiscuously and as a cover-all for so many different purposes.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I am thoroughly in accord with what has been said by the distinguished Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I thank my colleague and the junior Senator from South Carolina for their contributions. I agree with the conclusions announced by my distinguished colleague. I repeat what I have already stated, that I do not have the information as to whether the members of this advisory committee are dollar-a-year men. I know that with reference to the tire tests which are being conducted, one in California and one in Texas—remote sections of the country from Washington—it is quite conceivable that the men may have been paid considerable traveling expenses if they made trips to the scenes of the tests.

It may be said that I have not shown any connection between the rubber rajahs and rayon. Let me recall that the five largest of these companies own approximately 98 percent of the latex-treatment equipment for use in the manufacture of rayon tires, which would afford them a closed monopoly of the output of rayon-fabric tires.

It is obvious that the members of this committee have a special interest in whether rayor or cotton fabric is selected for Army tires—a selfish interest and a common interest which is opposed to the interests of the small tire manufacturer and the great cotton-growing people of the South. The supervision of the tests which mean so much to cotton farmers and little tiremen is handed over—lock, stock, and barrel—to their industrial enemies.

These intimations and disclosures are not merely confined to the experience of the Small Business Committee. Everywhere the official vestment of this bureaucracy is lifted we find the elephantine foot of big business. Recently I received a letter from the officers of the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association, representing a million farmers of this country—a letter going further in its charges than I am prepared at the moment to go. Senators may be already familiar with it, for my watchful colleague the senior Senator from Tennessee has had the letter placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

In brief, this association of farmers charges that the power branch of W. P. B. has twice "misinterpreted" the plain order of the W. P. B. and so continued to prohibit extensions to serve farm families from existing distribution lines, despite an acute need.

In placing responsibility for the obstruction, the association did not mince matters. I quote from the resolution:

> We are today confronted, through the press, with the astounding announcement that Curtis Ernest Calder, of Bronxville, N. Y., who lists his office address as No. 2 Rector Street, which is the office of the Electric Bond & Share Co., as Director General of Operations in the War Production Board, is now to determine the destiny of our country in the application of power to the production of food and to the relief of the shortage of manpower. Mr. Calder is a former secretary, vice president, and president of the Texas Power & Light Co., a subsidiary of Electric Bond & Share. He is now president of the American & Foreign Power Co., and he is a director in one of Mussolini's power companies—the Italian Super Power, Inc.

That, Mr. President, according to the record, is the background and connections of the man who, cloaked under the official title of Director General of Operations, W. P. B., is blocking the way of American farmers, who need electric current with which to operate their farms, already so acutely short of manpower, and to grow needed food for our armed forces and civilian workers.

The Rural Electrification cooperatives having cut the cost of electricity to farm families and so placed a restraint upon the economic license of these corporate giants, we know that those in control of the private corporate utilities are not interested in extending or sustaining the cooperatives.

There is the case of the independent meat packers, with which most Members of the Senate are familiar. As we know, the independent packers claim that the O. P. A. price ceilings, the custom slaughtering regulations, and the quota regulations are unfair to them.

I should like to cite specifically what Mr. Wilbur LaRoe, president of their national association, has to say about quota regulations. Speaking of the tremendous advantage they give to the big packers, he says:

> An advantage so great as to raise a question whether many of the smaller concerns, especially those having no quotas, can continue to exist. The unfairness of the quotas is due to the fact that only physical slaughtering was recognized as a basis for the quotas. Many hundreds of legitimate processors in the meat business were denied quotas merely because of the accidental fact that instead of doing the physical slaughtering themselves they hired agents to do it. Common sense was thrown to the winds by giving these agents the quotas and denying them to the principals. Such perversion of justice cannot be excused by alleged administrative difficulties. An efficient and just administration will overcome difficulties rather than resort to expedients that cause palpable injustice.
> The fixing of quotas on the basis of physical slaughtering played right into the hands of the big packers who have ample slaughtering facilities. So well equipped are they for slaughtering that hundreds of processors depended on them for carcasses or other supplies. Suddenly, by administrative fiat, these nonslaughtering processors found themselves without quotas and also without any source of supply because the big packers in many cases refused to supply their old customers. The latter were and now are threatened with ruin.
> The Office of Price Administration could have adopted a regulation requiring slaughterers to follow their old channels of supply, but the lame excuse is given that such recognition would have presented administrative difficulties. As a result of this grotesquely unfair administrative policy, the big packers are now in the position where they can use their great slaughtering facilities to their own advantage and, indeed, to take over the customers of the processors they formerly supplied.

That, in brief, is the plight of the small packer. If, Mr. President, you do not think it is producing actual grief and want among them, I will cite the situation in Cincinnati that almost exploded last week, and is still brewing. I am advised through Mr. Robert Brooks, of the Labor Division of O. P. A., that the supply of carcasses to the independents in that neighborhood has fallen so low that they have been forced to cut their work week about in half, or to let out 50 percent of their workers. That condition came to a head Friday when some 4,000 workers decided to call en masse on the United States Employment Office there and demand that, incident to the President's order extending the work week to 48 hours, they be given other jobs so as to be absorbed in an industry in which they could carry out the aim of the Presidential instruction.

By dint of the agitated efforts of local O. P. A. representatives, the employers, and the A. F. of L. leadership of the workers themselves, the public protest parade was called off, so I am told, because of an O. P. A. promise that a ceiling would be placed on live hogs to bring them within reach of the independents there. But obviously that is a stopgap measure and does not strike at the root of the difficulty, as analyzed by Mr. LaRoe. I refer to the O. P. A. quota regulations.

I cannot state now which O. P. A. bureaucrat found a policy of requiring slaughterers to follow their old channels "too difficult" to bother with; but, placing the most charitable interpretation on his motives, I should say that in his reasoning he was recklessly irresponsible toward hundreds of small packers throughout the country, whose welfare concerns the welfare of the national economy as a whole. I cannot say who the bureaucrat was, but his action—to my suspicious mind—smacks of big-business thinking and method; and I, for one, want to know who he was and why he did that destructive thing.

The cases for inquiry multiply. The Senate will recall that our able floor leader, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] cited on the floor of the Senate last week the case of a director of the Smaller War Plants Corporation who waited and waited to see the "big" men of W. P. B., and finally was told he was not needed, and to go home.

Recently a group of manufacturers representing the Southern work-clothes industry came to my office with a story of price regulation that will put them out of business, and has already done so in some instances. They are caught in a price squeeze that makes continued operation impossible, except at a loss, they told me.

They spoke of a member of their industry, a manufacturing wholesaler—I quote here from a brief they submitted to me—who was—> competing with those aggrieved by the operation of this order, who has been granted relief by the Office of Price Administration from the roll-back with respect to his prices, resulting in distinct competitive disadvantages to other members of the industry.

They cited the case of the Rice-Stix Co., as reported in the December 5, 1942, Federal Register. I do not know who was responsible for the order, or all the circumstances surrounding it. Those Southern work-clothes manufacturers are soon to have a hearing before the House Small Business Committee, I am told. But I should like to know who was responsible for the order and what were the circumstances. I frankly admit that I am suspicious of the motives of the bureaucrats involved.

I had hoped to have the details of another case to present to the Senate today, but they have not as yet reached me. The case is that of a Nashville constituent of mine, who, when he learned that the whole output of antifreeze manufactured before the war was being taken by the armed forces, had the vision and enterprise to compound a new antifreeze which required no critical materials, and to build a plant—without use of critical materials, either—to supply the civilian need. I might add that he salvaged an old brewery and with great resourcefulness improvised on the use of various fixtures in order to construct the plant without using critical materials demanded for the war program.

He manufactured what he insists is an entirely harmless and efficient antifreeze, and put it on the market at a price somewhat lower than that of Prestone and Zerex, the two formerly prevalent brands made by those giant corporations, Union Carbide & Carbon Corporation and the du Pont Co., respectively. Only last fall his product went on sale. Already, without ever giving it a test, O. P. A. is banning it as harmful. O. P. A. did not forbid its sale in the hands of retailers and distributors, who hold some hundreds of thousands of gallons of it, but forbade its sale only at the source of manufacture, fixing February 15 as the date for the effect of the ban.

That was not enough, it would seem, for it has also arbitrarily cut the price from $2.40 to 75 cents a gallon, without any rime or reason, or at least any reason it was willing to explain to the producer. It appears to me that it was not satisfied merely to close down his business, but, since he is operating in partnership without limitation of liability, it ordered a retail price which does not even meet his cost of manufacture—with the aim of crushing him financially, so that he will not again be a competitor or potential competitor of the monopolistic oligarchies.

My constituent does not know who dictated that order, nor do I, but for many reasons he is persuaded to believe that it was influenced by one of the corporate oligarchs who dodge in and out, playing hide and seek; and I admit that my suspicion is no less than his.

Perhaps many other Members of the Senate received, as I did, a copy of a letter sent to the President by the American Contractors' War Advisory Committee, who had been told that small business was essential, and who had organized to represent 24 employer associations of the building trades. They aver that they learned the procedure for obtaining war contracts, and told it to the small contractors everywhere. For 7 months they have been busy making contact with the chief awarding officers of the armed services, at whose instance they formed corporate pools of contractors, so as to enable them to handle the contracts. They advised the awarding officers of what they had done. They sought out Lou Holland, of the Smaller War Plants Corporation, who, quoting from the statement, "tried his best" to set up within the Corporation a special unit to help award war contracts to those pools; but "due to some powerful influence, directly opposed to our cause, he has been unable to do anything for us to date."

It is a pity about those little fellows, but they say their case is quite simple: Unlike big business, they just did not have the know-how.

Let me mention another case: In January 1941 the Government, as we know, filed an antitrust suit against General Electric and Westinghouse, the two behemoths of the electric-fixtures industry, and a group of subsidiary and "suffrance" companies. That was in the days when war clouds had darkened over the country, when even the man in the street feared that the rain of steel was imminent, and when the President was seeking, with poor success, to bring the big industries of the Nation into full production in preparation for the inevitable hour.

About the middle of that year—in August, to be exact—the independents of the electric-fixtures industry—the little men of fluorescent lighting, some 3,500 in number—sent their representatives to Washington to offer their services. Let me explain that the only small businessmen or operators in any wise independent in the lighting-fixtures business are, or were, the neon sign men—those who manufactured fluorescent display signs operating by means of what is called the cold cathode method, the only method for which I am told, the twin dynasties of the electric-fixtures empire do not hold the patents.

The little men of the fluorescent-lighting industry, responding to the Office of Production Management query as to what they could do to aid in war preparation, said that the sign industry was generally equipped to engage in light metal working and in some types of electrical work, but that it also had facilities for producing and installing lighting in plants engaged in war work. The O. P. M. said that was fine, and that such a conversion would be a very intelligent and practical thing for the sign industry to do. The sign men then asked for enough copper—not very much—to enable them to bring about the switch-over from making fluorescent signs to making fluorescent fixtures for indoor illumination. The O. P. M. demurred, but finally told the committee who had come to Washington that if they would go back and instruct the members of their industry to file separate applications accompanied with affidavits saying that they wanted to convert to the production of fluorescent-lighting equipment, they would be allowed the amount of copper—from 60 to 90 tons—which they sought. The little men sent in their applications and affidavits and waited.

In the meantime the executive branch of the Government had made peace with the big, bad boys of the lighting industry and postponed the suit against them.

We are told, according to the Government's averment in that suit and in another filed later, that the General Electric Co. and the Westinghouse Co., with their "suffrance" companies, have a monopoly on the incandescent-lighting field and on the indoor fluorescent-lighting field. Fluorescent lights for indoor illumination utilize what is called the hot-cathode method. It is the Government's further averment that fluorescent lights are much more efficient and use much less electricity than the old incandescent lamps use, but that because of a reputed agreement with certain electric-power utility corporations who did not want to have the fluorescent lights—using less current—come into general use, General Electric and Westinghouse had never pushed it on the market. The bill filed further avers that General Electric and Westinghouse had been willing to confine themselves to use of the hot cathode or indoor fluorescent lamp because they held the patents on it and because it was more profitable to manufacture. But they had warned—and were able to enforce their warning—the little men in the fluorescent-lighting industry that they must confine themselves to the making of signs—must stay "outdoors," to use the trade term.

As the Senate knows, after the war came, W. P. B. succeeded O. P. M., many bureaus sprang up—among them the lighting branch of the Industry Operations Division—and bureaucrats elbowed in. But not one of them was from the neon-sign industry. That little group continued to get the "brush-off."

Then in March of 1942 came a W. P. B. order requiring sign men to cut their sign production at first 50 percent and after July to cease production altogether. This prohibited them from continuing as sign men. They, of course, had been vainly seeking to convert to indoor illumination all this time. But in May there followed another order, denying materials to all fluorescent lighting manufacturers except those producing for essential uses. This order denied the sign men the means of joining in the war program or to survive at all and they were thus denied without consultation or warning and without any avenue of effectual appeal.

The point of this story is that 2,500 of these small businesses "died" waiting for the "sympathetic consideration" assured them in August 1941, 2,500 of the 3,500, employing between 65,000 and 70,000 skilled men. That is the story in the 15 pages of a brief prepared for me by Mr. Chalmers Hamill, Chief of the Small Business Section of the Department of Justice; and he specifies the orders and the acts.

Speaking of the sign men's appeals from the May order which denied them materials with which to make indoor fluorescent lamps, Mr. Hamill says:

> It is a fair statement to say that decision upon almost every appeal that was filed was unreasonably delayed, and that the eventual decision, if any was rendered, was almost invariably adverse to the appellant.

Finally, as the brief sets forth, the remnants of the sign businesses, under the leadership of the president of their association, Mr. Victor H. Todd, got to Lou Holland, of the Smaller War Plants Corporation. This was last August. He instructed the appropriate branch of W. P. B. to see to it that the necessary materials were allocated to four manufacturers of cold cathode transformers, as proposed by the sign men. These four manufacturers were to make 2,000 of these transformers to be held for the demand of cold cathode, or former sign men, for use in war orders under the terms of the May edict.

The branch heads of W. P. B. gave Mr. Holland lip service, but, according to this brief, their action continued to be delay and obstruction, with the result that only a few of the 2,000 transformers authorized in August had been delivered as of the 1st of this month.

Mr. Hamill cites as the high point of this bureaucratic obstruction an order, a copy of which he attaches to his brief. It was, he says, first issued in May as a secret and confidential order; it was not signed by any responsible person, agency, or department; it was not promulgated as an official order or distributed to a single person in the cold cathode industry, and it was never even mentioned in the meetings of the Industry Advisory Committee for the fluorescent lighting industry until in November. The effect of this order was to eliminate the fluorescent lighting industry by requiring practically all installations to be incandescent for the duration, and this in the face of the fact that incandescent lamps cost far more in critical materials and in current consumed.

So the small outdoor-lighting men have remained "outdoors" in a very ironical sense, while sinisterly within the portals of their Government sit a former president of the twice-accused corporation, General Electric, at the right hand of Donald Nelson, himself; a former vice president of that company, at the head of the Industry Operations Division of W. P. B.; also a man from the Corning Glass Co., another of the big companies named in the Government suits; another man formerly of General Electric and Central Hudson Gas and Electric Co., who is, or was, chief of the lighting fixtures division—and a host of lesser men of the big electric fixtures corporations whom I know not.

There is much outcry against the economist, the theorist in the Government, and I am certainly not here to defend him; but I am less disturbed by theorists and economists than I am by some gentlemen who know far more what they are about, and I am talking about the representatives of big business, the men of the monopolistic corporations who infest, I suspect, every emergency agency of this Government.

Yes; big business has the know-how—the know-how to throttle everybody and everything that stands in its way, and I do not exempt the national interests of this country or the success of our arms in this war.

Perhaps I am jumping to a conclusion on insufficient evidence or on mere suspicion; that is possible, and that is the reason for my appeal here today; that is why I have presumed to impose on the patience of the Senate with this long review of occurences, some of which must be familiar to every Member of the body.

I do not know who are responsible for all these destructive and obstructive acts, but I want to know and I think the Members of the Senate and the Congress and the people of this country should know. So I am urging the Small Business Committee to ask the authority of this body to require from every emergency agency of this whole bureaucracy a report of the age, education, and business or professional affiliations and background in full during the 5-year period preceding their employment by the Government of every employee drawing $4,500 annual salary, or greater, and of every dollar-a-year man connected with the Government in any way whatsoever, and all who have been so connected during this emergency.

I will propose to the committee that they designate a case-work subcommittee to probe into the reports of specific instances prejudicial and destructive to small business and its participation in the war program and the instances where such prejudice amounts to an obstruction to the war effort. I am proposing that this case-work committee determine the specific acts, edicts, and policies that cause, or reflect this destruction and obstruction, and uncover the specific bureaucrats responsible for them, either by action or influence. I will offer my services to act on such a subcommittee.

Even that, however, will not go far enough to uproot the predatory, the irresponsible, and the obstructive in the Federal bureaucracy. We who have watched know that their bigness has made them overbearing and contemptuously bold. It will take action to prove what the will and intention of the Congress and the people are. I suggest that it might be a good idea for the Senate to establish some sort of a policy of public censure.

I think it is up to us to defend that champion of small business, the President, against the wolves within his gates that gnaw at his heels while he is engaged with the enemy without.

Mr. President, returning to that alarming summary of small business' share in wartime production, let me make another proposal. I had heard that the total prime war contracts obtained for small business through the Smaller War Plants Corporation was the pitiful share of $200,000,000. Here on the floor last week the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] stated that the share was somewhat higher, namely, $846,000,000. Last December, General Somervell testified before the Small Business Committee that small business' share totaled 20 percent of all War Department contracts, or $4,000,000,000 worth. Last week a statistician at the Smaller War Plants Corporation told me that the corporation did not accept the figures given by General Somervell, but he was indefinite, indeed, by implication, he admitted that they did not know how much in war contracts had gone to small business.

I propose that the Smaller War Plants Corporation be empowered and instructed to determine, through first-hand, or documentary information, the number, amount, and distribution of prime and subcontracts that have gone to small business. We do not want statistical sleight-of-hand; we want the facts. Let us get at the bottom of this matter. Moreover, I have been unable to obtain any accurate figures as to just what war contracts have been let for this and the next fiscal years. W. P. B. and O. W. I. have advised me that over-all totals do not exist, and it would require some time to compile them. But I have drawn some deductions from over-all figures submitted by the President in his budget message and from the Budget Director's letter to the Honorable CLARENCE CANNON, of the House of Representatives, which appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 5.

Of the $170,000,000,000 yet unspent, two-thirds have been obligated or committed for expenditure during this and the next fiscal year. Of this total we may eliminate from our consideration 17.2 billion dollars for the R. F. C. and other Government corporations, and another $36,000,000,000 for military and civilian pay, subsistence and travel, although there is much in that category of contractual interest to small business. This leaves 120.3 billion dollars, of which the two-thirds obligated or committed represent 80.2 billion dollars.

Those obligations and commitments, if the budget message break-down is a yardstick, are divided between the fiscal year 1943 and the fiscal year 1944 in roughly a 7 to 10 ratio. That would mean there are approximately $32,000,000,000 contracted for 1943 deliveries and approximately $48,000,000,000 contracted for 1944 deliveries.

The Corporation's new head, the affable Colonel Johnson, has recently talked pretty stoutly for the press about the share of contracts he was going to get for small business—twenty-five to thirty billion dollars' worth, he was quoted as saying. This is as it should be. It is acutely needed. But he did not say where he was going to get any such amount.

If the commitments against existing appropriations are allowed to stand, it seems obvious to me that he has little chance of getting any such share for small business during 1943 or 1944. If we wait till after 1944 to start cutting small companies in, it will most certainly be too late to pump money into many small businesses which are being strangled, but which even now might be usefully serving the war program. The breaking point is here, and the time to aid small business has arrived. It cannot survive on promises and future hopes. We have already been told of instances of concerns which have contracts which they cannot perform.

I suggest that the Small Business Committee be authorized to bring before it the procurement heads and contract makers and commitment devisers of all the Government agencies interested in this $80,000,000,000, for a reexamination of these contracts, their amounts and dates of delivery, showing all particulars, all looking toward a renegotiation of all or part of that titanic chunk of $48,000,000,000 worth of contracts and like instruments slated for the maw of the big business behemoths for the fiscal year 1944. I suggest, incident to reexamination and possible renegotiation, that all contracts for 1944 deliveries on which work has not actually begun, be suspended as of this date except where the President, in his discretion, deems that a contract suspension would be harmful to the prosecution of the war.

If this seems drastic action, I repeat, the situation demands drastic action. It would be ironical and absurd if, engaged as we are in a mortal struggle to preserve our way of life, we should now choke to death that which we seek to save, and, apparently, too pressed by need, too entangled by fell circumstance, to perceive fully the movement of our hands.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the Coast and Geodetic Survey nominations be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc. That completes the Executive Calendar.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified immediately of all confirmations of today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be forthwith notified of all confirmations of today.

INCREASE IN SIZE OF THE ARMY—ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I should like to ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to consider a bill in which the Army is very much interested. It is a bill merely to raise the ceiling upon the number of men in the armed forces who may be sent to educational institutions, inductees who are in uniform and who have had the usual 13 weeks of basic training. The bill provides for removing the existing 2-percent limitation so that the Army may be permitted to put more men into the colleges and universities.

I am just informed that there is an agreement with the leader on the other side to the effect that we are not to take up any bills today, but it would be perfectly agreeable to me if the representative of the minority would permit this matter to be considered, and if the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] shall later indicate any objection, I shall be glad to withdraw the request.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, as the Senator from North Carolina knows, the Senator from Oregon is unavoidably absent, due to illness. He asked the Senator from Kentucky, and I think he indicated his desire to others, that there should not be a call of the calendar today. I do not know whether the objection of the Senator was to the call of the calendar, and to all the bills on the calendar, or to some particular bill. I do not know whether it is this particular bill which the Senator from Oregon did not want considered today. I have a feeling that no national calamity will ensue if this bill is not acted upon this afternoon, and I think that, out of deference to the desire of the Senator from Oregon, the measure should go over.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I shall not insist upon my request. I think we can have the bill considered on Thursday, and the minority leader is always so accommodating about such requests that if there was even a suspicion of acting contrary to his desires I should not want to place myself in the position of suggesting action at this time.

Mr. BARKLEY. I appreciate the Senator's attitude. The Senator from Oregon sent word to me that, because of his illness today, he would not like to have the calendar called. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] was interested in a bill which was passed with the understanding that the Senator from Oregon, when the Senate meets again, could ask for reconsideration. That means, of course, that it will go over until Thursday anyway. So that no harm could come in allowing the bill in which the Senator is interested to go over originally. I appreciate the position taken by the Senator from North Carolina in the matter.

Mr. REYNOLDS. The arrangement suggested is entirely agreeable to me.

ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY

Mr. BARKLEY. If there is no further business, as in legislative session, I move that the Senate adjourn until Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 19 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Thursday, February 25, 1943, at 12 o'clock noon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1943

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art the maker of all things and the lover of all men, grant that Thine approval may be more to us than the plaudits of this world, giving our fellow citizens potent examples of honest living, faith, and virtue. In loss and in panic, Thou hast led us as a people; do Thou quiet the pulse of doubt and distempered fears. Today let us lift our thoughts to the resounding hills and be revitalized by the spirit of him who was first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen.

We pray that we may be prophets of a new day, inspired by him whose very soul recognized the sacredness of human freedom so much that he dedicated his life, his wealth, his kin, and his all at the altar of the lagging Colonies. Almighty God, as these moments are grave, oh may school and church, labor and management, catch the spirit of our immortal Virginia patriot and feel the highest honor to consecrate themselves at the shrine of our democracy. Oh, may our blessed land heed the word from the Book of Life:

Be strong in the Lord and in the power of His might. Put on the whole armor of God, that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil; for we wrestle against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places. Wherefore take unto you the whole armor of God that ye may be able to stand in the evil day and having done all, to stand.

Through Christ, our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, February 19, 1943, was read and approved.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial published in the Washington Evening Star, of Friday, February 19, in relation to the elimination of the House provision to finance the work of the National Resources Planning Board.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had not intended to recognize any Member to proceed for 1 minute, today, but the Chair has had so many requests that the Chair is going to recognize Members to proceed for 1 minute. Without objection, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZPATRICK] may proceed for 1 minute.

There was no objection.

[Mr. FITZPATRICK addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

SEPARATE COMMITTEE ON AVIATION

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my own remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, Members of the House have asked me if I knew how people in the aviation industry felt about the necessity of creating a standing committee in the House to consider legislation relating to civil aviation.

On February 18, I wrote Mr. E. E. Wilson, president of United Aircraft Corporation, asking him if he would express his views regarding the setting up of this proposed committee. Mr. Wilson speaks for 4 of the most important units in the industry, employing more than 50,000 employees.

I can think of no other individual whose opinion should carry more weight with Members of the House who have not as yet made up their minds on this subject.

A telegram from Mr. Wilson follows:

EAST HARTFORD, CONN., February 22, 1943.
Congressman WILLIAM J. MILLER:

Replying your letter February 18 and speaking for Pratt & Whitney, Hamilton, Chance Vought, and Sikorsky, we favor establishment House Aviation Committee. We believe report of Morrow board called to investigate Mitchell charges is magna carta American aviations. Morrow board concluded a strong air force to be a necessity for national security and that private industry must be backbone of such force. Following this report and congressional action looking to steady development Army, Navy, and commercial aviation made progress. We believe each of these three services should develop freely in accordance with its own requirements with each, utilizing the work of the other to promote general progress. Air transport has now taken on such global significance, we believe separate committee of Congress essential to its proper development. In addition, it now seems probable private flying will develop rapidly after hostilities, utilizing new vehicles such as Sikorsky helicopter. With this development, aviation will come of age. We believe committee essential to progress development of aviation and very much in the public interest.

UNITED AIRCRAFT CORPORATION,
By E. E. WILSON, President.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SNYDER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, the Washington Post of February 21, 1943, stated that one of our colleagues on the other end of the Capitol in an address made in Philadelphia the night before made the following statement:

> The general feeling is that the military has always asked for too much. I think the record will support this feeling.

As chairman of the House Subcommittee on Army Appropriations for the last 6 years, I know that the Army before Pearl Harbor never did ask for enough. Of course they did not get all that they asked for of the Bureau of the Budget in those years, but I am proud to say that my committee in many war items gave them more than the Bureau of the Budget set up in the estimates.

Mr. Speaker, I am still convinced that Gen. George C. Marshall and the able corps of officers he has under him throughout the States and the world are in position to know what the Army needs and why they need it, much better than any civilian or group of civilians.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, on Friday last I obtained permission to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include an article entitled "In Time of War Prepare for Peace." I had an estimate from the Public Printer, but because the exact amount did not show in the RECORD it has not been printed. The amount is $120, and, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have the article included notwithstanding the estimate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE]?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, 18 years ago today, I believe it was, for some mysterious reason the House, probably for the first time, omitted reading Washington's Farewell Address on the birthday of the Father of our Country. I served notice then that as long as I was in Congress it would never be omitted again, if I could prevent it. I have carried out that promise.

Today the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STARNES] has very kindly agreed to read that address to the House. In order that Members may have a chance to hear this great message to the American people from the greatest of all Americans, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STARNES] will read Washington's Farewell Address.

Mr. STARNES. Mr. Speaker, Washington's Farewell Address:

To the people of the United States:

FRIENDS AND FELLOW CITIZENS: The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed, to decline being considered among the number of those, out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you, at the same time, to do me the justice to be assured, that this resolution has not been taken, without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that, in withdrawing the tender of service which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest; no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness; but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of, and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me, have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty, and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this, previous to the last election, had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations, and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence, impelled me to abandon the idea.

I rejoice that the state of your concerns, external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety; and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country, you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust, were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust, I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed towards the organization and administration of the government, the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset, of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience, in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and, every day, the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more, that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that, while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is to terminate the career of my political life, my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country, for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me; and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment, by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise, and as an instructive example in our annals, that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead amidst appearances sometimes dubious, vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging—in situations in which not unfrequently, want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism,—the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts, and a guarantee of the plans, by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave, as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence—that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual—that the free constitution, which is the work of your hands, may be sacredly maintained—that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue—that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these states, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation, and so prudent a use of this blessing, as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare, which cannot end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger, natural to that solicitude, urge me, on an occasion like the present, to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review, some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom, as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget, as an encouragement to it, your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquillity at home; your peace abroad; of your safety; of your prosperity; of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But as it is easy to foresee that, from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed; it is of infinite moment, that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can, in any event, be abandoned; and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth, or choice, of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism, more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have, in a common cause, fought and triumphed together; the independence and liberty you possess, are the work of joint counsels, and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they addressed themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest.—Here, every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The north, in an unrestrained intercourse with the south, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter, great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise, and precious materials of manufacturing industry.—The south, in the same intercourse, benefiting by the same agency of the north, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the north, it finds its particular navigation invigorated; and while it contributes, in different ways, to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength, to which itself is unequally adapted. The east, in a like intercourse with the west, already finds, and in the progressive improvement of interior communications by land and water, will more and more find a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad, or manufactures at home. The west derives from the east supplies requisite to its growth and comfort—and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions, to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one nation. Any other tenure by which the west can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength; or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While then every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined cannot fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts, greater strength, greater resource, proportionably greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations; and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union, an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves, which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same government; which their own rivalship alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues, would stimulate and embitter. Hence likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments, which under any form of government are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is, that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind and exhibit the continuance of the union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union, affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who, in any quarter, may endeavor to weaken its hands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations,—northern and southern—Atlantic and western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart burnings which spring from these misrepresentations; they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head; they have seen, in the negotiation by the executive, and in the unanimous ratification by the senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at the event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the general government and in the Atlantic states, unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties, that with Great Britain and that with Spain, which secure to them everything they could desire, in respect to our foreign relations, towards confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such they are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your Union, a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute; they must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances, in all times, have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay, by the adoption of a constitution of government, better calculated than your former, for an intimate union, and for the efficacious management of your common concerns. This government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and maintaining within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government.—But the constitution which at any time exists, until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power, and the right of the people to establish government, presuppose the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberations and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle, and of fatal tendency.—They serve to organize faction, to give it an artificial and extraordinary force, to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation the will of party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community; and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill concerted and incongruous projects of faction, rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans digested by common councils, and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men, will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government; destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Towards the preservation of your government and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular opposition to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretext. One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system; and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments, as of other human institutions:—that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country:—that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion, exposes to perpetual change from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion: and remember, especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours, a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name, where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the state, with particular references to the founding them on geographical discrimination. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind.—It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism.—But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result, gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and, sooner or later, the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purpose of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind, (which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight) the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils, and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foments occasional riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which finds a facilitated access to the government itself through the channels of party passions. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government, and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true; and in governments of a monarchial cast, patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency, it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose. And there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be, by force of public opinion, to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent it bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming, it should consume.

It is important likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department, to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominate in the human heart, is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions of the others, has been evinced by experiments ancient and modern; some of them in our country and under our own eyes.—To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the constitution designates.—But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism, who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? and let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect, that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religion principle.

It is substantially true, that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric?

Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion, it should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering, also, that timely disbursements, to prepare for danger, frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions, in time of peace, to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burden which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should cooperate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty, it is essential that you should practically bear in mind, that towards the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes, that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper object (which is always a choice of difficulties,) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue, which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice towards all nations; cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct, and can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and, at no distant period, a great nation, to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt but, in the course of time and things, the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it; can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan, nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others, should be excluded; and that, in place of them, just and amicable feelings towards all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges towards another an habitual hatred, or an habitual fondness, is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur. Hence, frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation, prompted by ill will and resentment, sometimes impels to war the government, contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject; at other times, it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty of nations, has been the victim.

So likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducements or justifications. It leads also to concessions, to the favorite nation, of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions, by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted or deluded citizens who devote themselves to the favorite nation, facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or a laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils!—Such an attachment of a small or weak, towards a great and powerful nation, dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, (I conjure you to believe me fellow citizens,) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove, that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another, cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots, who may resist the intrigues of the favorite, are liable to become suspected and odious; while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith:—Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence, she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collusions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation, when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliance with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maximum no less applicable to public than private affairs, that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat it, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But in my opinion, it is unnecessary, and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments, on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, and a liberal intercourse with all nations, are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand: neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary, and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view, that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance, it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect, or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend, I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish; that they will control the usual current of the passions, or prevent our nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations, but if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good; that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism; this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far, in the discharge of my official duties, I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated, the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is, that I have, at least, believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe; my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both houses of congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take, and was bound, in duty and interest, to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverence and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct, it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without any thing more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity towards other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress, without interruption, to that degree of strength, and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my administration, I am unconscious of intentional error, I am nevertheless too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence; and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service, with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love towards it, which is so natural to a man who views in it the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations; I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize without alloy, the sweet enjoyment of partaking, in the midst of my fellow citizens, the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors and dangers.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES,
19th September, 1796.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont.

There was no objection.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, while it is true, as we have observed from understanding the reading of his speech, that George Washington warned us against and emphasized the danger inherent in entangling foreign alliances as such, it is not usually observed that in this same speech he said—and I desire to emphasize his statement:

> We may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

This statement has too long gone unemphasized—and he goes on to say:

> Harmony and aliberal intercourse with all nations are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest.

The farseeing vision and unexcelled wisdom of the Father of our Country should not be constricted nor limited by the bounds some short-sighted people these days undertake to emphasize and to impose.

The counsel and advice in this immortal address is as apropos and as applicable today as of the day and date of its delivery, if it be read and heard understandingly as a whole, as it should be.

Too many people who have ears to hear do not listen, while many of those who have eyes read with one eye shut today.

St. Paul, in his epistle to the Romans, said:

> Whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning.

We should take notice and govern ourselves accordingly.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

[Mr. HARE addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, in all the years that we have celebrated Washington's Birthday and listened to the sound advice given to the American people for their guidance in the conduct of their Government—never have we stood in greater need for the good advice given us in his Farewell Address and I particularly commend for the consideration of my colleagues and the people of this country the following passages from his address, so ably presented to the Members of the House today by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STARNES]:

> As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible: Avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering also that timely disbursements to prepare for danger frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, exertions in time of peace to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars may have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burthen which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your Representatives, but it is necessary that public opinion should cooperate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty.

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence (I conjure you to believe me fellow citizens) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government.

Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1943

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, in a changing world we pray in the name of a changeless Christ and rejoice that faith hath still its Olivet and love its Calvary. Grant that we may be delivered from indifference, lest the spiritual chords cease to vibrate and the appeal of the soul becomes dead. Forbid that we should approach the throne of grace with our own achievements or things of personal gain. We would seek Thy presence as the pathway of eternal righteousness and truth.

We pray that we may keep in memory the tears over Jerusalem, the wounded that grieved Thee at Bethany, and realize in our breasts that sympathy which came from the rent in our Saviour's heart. As we walk through the green pastures of our fair America, let us have a deep sense of the groanings by which they were wrought. Thou hast caused in the inner darkness of suffering souls the sweetest music; as gold in the furnace, we are being tried; oh, help us to be worthy of all Thou hast done and taught. Bestow upon us the breath of the higher life, blessing us with the utmost things revealed in our sacrificial Lord. For newness of courage, of understanding, and for all the fruits of the spirit we pray now and ever, in the name of our Saviour and Redeemer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 707. An act to provide for the appointment of an additional Assistant Attorney General.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 158) entitled "An act to amend the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, to permit consolidations and mergers of domestic telegraph carriers, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. BARKLEY and Mr. BREWSTER members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of August 5, 1939, entitled "An act to provide for the disposition of certain records of the United States Government," for the disposition of executive papers in the following departments and agencies:

1. Department of Agriculture.
2. Department of Commerce.
3. Department of the Navy.
4. Executive Office of the President (Board of Economic Warfare).
5. Federal Security Agency.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include a short poem.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein a very able address last night by Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker before the Legislature of the State of New York.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RESOLUTION INVITING CAPT. EDDIE RICKENBACKER TO ADDRESS CONGRESS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, one of our greatest living Americans is Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker.

He is one of the greatest heroes of all time.

His life's story will be a thrilling inspiration to the children of coming generations.

His address to the New York Legislature last night was one of the greatest patriotic appeals ever made. I am inserting it in the Appendix of today's RECORD.

I am introducing a resolution inviting him to address the Members of Congress, the Members of both the House and the Senate.

To me it is inconceivable that one of our greatest living heroes of two wars should go through what Eddie Rickenbacker has gone through, come back alive, and be invited everywhere else to address legislative as well as civic bodies, and not be invited to address the Members of Congress.

I am sending my resolution to the Clerk's desk to be read. After that I shall ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not care to recognize the gentleman at this time for the consideration of the resolution. It would have to be referred to the Committee on Rules in any event.

Mr. RANKIN. Then I ask the other Members of the House to appeal to the Committee on Rules to bring this resolution out tomorrow, so that we may invite this dynamic hero to address the Congress of the United States.

The resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, That Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker be, and he is hereby, invited to address the Members of Congress, including Members of both the House and the Senate, in the Hall of the House of Representatives, at his earliest convenience; and that the Speaker appoint a committee of three Members to communicate with Captain Rickenbacker and to make such arrangements as may be necessary for his reception.

MOHANDAS GANDHI

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, Mohandas Gandhi has millions of followers in India who regard him not as a human being but as a hallowed saint who can do no wrong. His well-advertised death in prison would be a powerful weapon our enemies would use unscrupulously. Neither we nor our allies can afford to waste lives and resources quelling revolts now.

I, therefore, hereby beg on bended knees that Gandhi be released before he dies. To save the dignity of those who need dignity I urge that it be done as a gracious concession to soft-hearted Americans like me, of whom, I think, there are plenty. Our shoulders are broad, and we do not mind stooping to conquer.

FARM FOOD PRODUCTION

Mr. CARLSON of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Mr. CARLSON of Kansas addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Miss STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include two letters on the subject of postal employees' wages.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include a letter from the Retirement Board.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include a resolution received from Hon. Charles W. Lyon, speaker of the Assembly of the Legislature of the State of California.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

VOLUNTARY FARM WAR CORPS

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute, and include as a part of my remarks a bill that I am introducing for the establishment of a voluntary farm war corps.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts addressed the House. Her remarks appear in the Appendix.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix and include therewith the provisions of a bill for the incorporation of labor organizations, which I introduced in Congress on February 10.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEFFERNAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein an editorial by Edwin Wilson, editor of the Brooklyn Eagle, which appeared in that newspaper on February 22, 1943.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FOOD RATIONING

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday virtually every Washington paper carried a rather detailed account of the so-called point-rationing system and carried a photostatic copy of the consumer declaration that every consumer must make on coffee and canned goods.

In the lower left-hand corner of this official form appeared a little box that contained this notice:

NOTICE

Section 35 (A) of the United States Criminal Code makes it a criminal offense, punishable by a maximum of 10 years' imprisonment, $10,000 fine, or both, to make a false statement or representation as to any matter within the jurisdiction of any department or agency of the United States.

If any Member of this House, any lawyer, any citizen, will go to the trouble to examine section 35 (A) of the Criminal Code, he will find that it is predicated upon a willful and knowing misrepresentation. I think it is something of an outrage for the Office of Price Administration, with a Budget-approved form, to hold up to the humble citizens of this country that if they make a mistake in answering the questions on that form there looms before them a fine up to $10,000 or imprisonment for 10 years, or both. It is high time for the Smith committee to get busy on that sort of thing.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include an editorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THREE ARMIES

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to extend my remarks and include therein an editorial from the Philadelphia Inquirer on farm production.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Mr. GROSS addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

CIVIL AVIATION

Mr. REECE of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Mr. REECE of Tennessee addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include therein a resolution passed by the Wayne Co-Operative Milk Producers, Inc., Fort Wayne, Ind.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on two topics, and in one to include an editorial from the Saturday Evening Post, and in the other to include an address delivered by Miss Dorothy Comingore, a motion-picture star.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks and include certain data. The data I seek to include exceeds the quota allowed. I have an estimate from the Government Printer, which is attached, showing that it will cost $202.50.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Mr. COFFEE addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

QUOTAS ON WHEAT

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Speaker, I thought the Members of the House would be interested to know that the Secretary of Agriculture has this morning signed a release and order removing limitations on the production of wheat during the year 1943.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Are there any strings tied to that order?

Mr. PACE. I am not in a position at the moment to give you the details of the order. I am trying to get it, but the order was released at 10:30 this morning, removing the limitations on the production of wheat.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I will say to the gentleman that there is a string tied to the order that requires the farmers to raise 90 percent of the crops dictated by the Secretary.

Mr. PACE. I do not think there is any doubt but what the order will contain a provision that these very vital and essential war crops must be produced. Personally I can find no objection to that provision, when the Nation is in critical need of certain crops, that they should necessarily be produced along with whatever acreage of wheat you desire.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. In the light of the gentleman's pronouncement, plus the fact there are other actions that should be taken by the Secretary of Agriculture, does the committee propose to bring up H. R. 1605 today?

Mr. PACE. The gentleman from South Carolina, Chairman FULMER, has asked the majority leader to permit the passing over of that bill for the time being, in view of those developments.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on two different subjects, and in one to include an article by George Q. Lynch, and in the other a broadcast by John B. Hughes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include Senate Joint Memorial No. 8 with reference to establishing facilities for the recovery and production of sponge iron and steel.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, in view of the withdrawal of the farm bill I should like to inquire of the majority leader what the program will be for today and tomorrow.

Mr. McCORMACK. The bill amending the Civilian Pilot Training Act will be the order of business today, and thereafter a bill out of the Naval Affairs Committee, H. R. 1692, authorizing the construction of certain shore establishments, will be taken up. That will be the business for today and tomorrow. That will be followed by the Columbia Basin bill.

POSTAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. HARTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HARTLEY. Mr. Speaker, for 18 long years the postal employees of this Nation have waited for some recognition by the Congress in the way of an increase of salary. I should like to call to the attention of the House the fact that this morning the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House started hearings on salary increase legislation, and I want to take this opportunity to compliment the chairman of our committee, the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BURCH] for having inaugurated those hearings. I also wish to urge the friends of postal employees here in the House to appear before our committee to submit, in person or in writing, statements in support of this legislation.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, after the conclusion of the legislative business for the day, I may address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON AVIATION

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to read into the RECORD at this point a telegram I have just received from the air-line pilots in the city of New Orleans in reference to the Nichols resolution:

NEW ORLEANS, LA., February 22, 1943.

Hon. OVERTON BROOKS,
House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

We the undersigned air-line pilots, living in New Orleans, earnestly request that you oppose and vote against the approval and passage of JACK NICHOLS' House Resolution No. 23. The Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee now handles very satisfactorily and efficiently all legislative matters pertaining to all modes of transportation, including air-line transportation and commercial aviation legislation generally.

Respectfully yours,

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks on two subjects and to include in one extension two letters.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit two requests: First, to extend my own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD on the life and services of Joseph J. Sinnott and to include certain remarks I made formerly in the House.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND. The second request is to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the report of the Atlantic States

Marine Fisheries Commission, and to include therein certain excerpts from that report.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON AVIATION

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Speaker, I just took note of the telegram that was read by the gentleman from Louisiana which was sent by air-line pilots. I happen to have in my hand a whole group of telegrams from air-line pilots opposing Resolution No. 23. I have read them over. They are so similar that I have no doubt they were inspired by someone.

I am willing to bet anyone that these air-line pilots have no conception of what this bill is; that if you asked them how air-line activities are being handled now they would not know that they were being handled by the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. I do not mind giving consideration to spontaneous letters or telegrams, but where it is plainly evident that they are inspired I think we should take that into consideration.

HEARINGS ON H. R. 1605

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, since the peanut bill is not going to be brought up today, there is a little matter I want to get straightened out. I was the one who told the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] and also the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] that we had not had any hearings on H. R. 1605. We heard a lot of talk about it, but we did not have any hearings. I made that statement on the floor. I noticed the other day that my good friend and colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. WICKERSHAM] challenged that statement by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]. I should like at this time to repeat my statement and to assure both the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] that I was telling them the truth.

ADDITIONAL ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 707) to provide for the appointment of an additional Assistant Attorney General.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 348 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., title 5, sec. 295), be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"There shall be in the Department of Justice six officers, learned in the law, called the Assistant Attorneys General, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall assist the Attorney General and Solicitor General in the performance of their duties."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish the gentleman would explain the need for this legislation.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been acted on by the Senate and is on the Speaker's desk. The House committee has unanimously reported an identical bill. The bill was requested by the Department of Justice. The request is based primarily upon the fact that there has been a substantial increase because of war activities. If the gentleman will permit, I will read a very short letter which will give the explanation. This is a letter written by the Department of Justice to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and it is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 10, 1943.

Hon. FREDERICK VAN NUYS,
Chairman, Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The number of Assistant Attorneys General in the Department of Justice, in addition to the Assistant Attorney General in charge of customs matters whose office is in New York City, was reduced from six to five by section 16 of the act of June 16, 1933 (48 Stat. 307). These five officials head five divisions of the Department: The Antitrust, the Claims, the Criminal, the Lands, and the Tax Divisions.

The growth of the Department of Justice is indicated by the fact that the number of employees has risen since 1939 from 9,000 to 29,000. This growth is solely attributable to the war work of the Department, the increase in personnel being almost entirely absorbed by the war activities of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Immigration and Naturalization Service. This growth, however, has placed a heavy burden upon the small group of persons at the top who are responsible for making policy and reporting directly to me. Despite this large growth, which has brought many responsibilities to me, there have been no additions in personnel of men who under my immediate supervision direct this vital work.

In May of 1942, after consultation with officials of the Bureau of the Budget, I created in the Department a War Division. This division includes the War Frauds Unit, the Special War Policies Unit, the Alien Enemy Control Unit, and the Alien Property Litigation Unit.

The Solicitor General, who is the second ranking officer of the Department, has been acting as head of the War Division. During the summer of 1942, when the Supreme Court was not in session, this arrangement worked admirably. Since the Supreme Court resumed its sessions, however, it has become more and more apparent that the Solicitor General cannot properly be asked to divert from the duties of his own extremely important office the time and energy which he has had to devote to the work of the War Division.

The efficient functioning of the War Division requires it to be headed by an official who will devote all his time to it. It is highly desirable, in view of the importance of the work of the Division, that its head be an Assistant Attorney General. With this status, he would rank with the heads of other divisions of the Department, and, like them, would be a member of my immediate staff.

For these reasons I recommend that legislation be enacted authorizing the appointment of an additional Assistant Attorney General. I send you herewith a draft of a bill.

The proposed legislation would not involve additional expense. It would, in fact, actually decrease the expenditures of the War Division. The chiefs of the various units in the War Division have already been so classified by the Civil Service Commission that the head of this Division, even if he were not an Assistant Attorney General, would undoubtedly be classified by the Civil Service Commission at $9,000. An Assistant Attorney General receives $9,000 a year. On the other hand, an Assistant Attorney General could so combine the various administrative services of each of the four operating units as to eliminate much duplication with the result that administrative expenses would be considerably decreased.

I am informed by the Director of the Bureau of the Budget that the legislation proposed is in accordance with the program of the President.

Sincerely yours,
FRANCIS BIDDLE, Attorney General.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. This is practically restoring an office that was previously in effect but eliminated when the administration was proclaiming the fact it was going to save 25 percent of governmental expenditures?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes; under the economy arrangement.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. And this is about all they did?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes. This bill will probably save money and will increase the efficiency of the administration.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. One more question. There is need for this legislation, in view of the fact that the Senate has unanimously approved it and also the gentleman's committee, but someone has suggested that this is possibly to take care of a "lame duck." Does the gentleman know anything about that?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; I do not know of any "crippled duck" that is around in the neighborhood of this job.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman think they have all been taken care of now?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; there are still some around that have not been taken care of yet.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the estimated cost of this provision?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The estimate given to the committee, and it seemed sound to the committee, is that this would reduce the total amount. It involves four division heads, as I recall, each of whom is getting around $9,000, which is the amount being paid to the Assistant Attorneys General. It is contemplated by doing this we may eliminate some of the heads of divisions and others of the personnel. At the present time most of the work, if not all the work, that it is expected will be directed by the contemplated Assistant Attorney General, is being taken care of by the Solicitor General. The Solicitor General at the time the Supreme Court was not in session did very well with the job, but we are told now that the duties of the Solicitor General are such that he cannot be expected to do the work it is contemplated this Attorney General will do.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. It appears to me that this Department has been doing a lot of things in the last few years that it should not concern itself about. It seems to me that if this Department would devote its efforts to performing the duties and functions with which it is really charged, it might not need this additional help. I shall not object, but I do feel that bills of this kind should be brought in under a rule and the Congress be given an opportunity to learn more about them.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]?

There was no objection.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H. R. 1903) was laid on the table.

AMENDMENT TO SECTION 2 OF THE CIVILIAN TRAINING ACT OF 1939, AS AMENDED

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 1670) to amend section 2 of the Civilian Pilot Training Act of 1939, as amended.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE]?

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know whether there is going to be debate on this bill and an opportunity to amend it?

Mr. BULWINKLE. I may say to the gentleman that we have a rule which the gentleman from Oklahoma is ready to report. This is a small bill and we thought in order to save the time of the House we would take it up under unanimous consent, but we are entirely willing to go ahead and call up the rule.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I understand if the bill is called up by unanimous consent there will be an hour of general debate?

Mr. BULWINKLE. Yes, there will be an hour.

Mr. HINSHAW. Will the bill be subject to amendment under the 5-minute rule?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Yes, that would follow.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection. My only reason for mentioning the matter at all is that section 2 of the bill is believed by the Appropriations Committee to be subject to proper amendment in order to take care of the appropriation matter in the proper way. That is the only reason I offered a reservation of objection.

Mr. BULWINKLE. May I say to the gentleman that I do not think there will be any objection to consenting to that without debate.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, may I call the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina to the fact that I have submitted section 2 of the bill to the Appropriations Committee, and the clerk of that committee believes that the wording of that section should be changed. Otherwise, I have no objection to the bill whatsoever.

Mr. BULWINKLE. We will agree to take that up under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. HINSHAW. There is no need for debate from my standpoint at all. It is a mere matter of proper amendment to section 2.

Mr. Speaker, under authority granted to extend my remarks, I desire to say that I took occasion to inquire concerning the language of section 2 this morning. I inquired of the very able clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. Marc Sheild. He agreed with me that this language was most peculiar and unusual. I then inquired concerning that language of the distinguished Parliamentarian, our friend, Mr. Deschler, who agreed that section 2 as written is subject to being stricken on a point of order. I then requested that expert draftsman of appropriation language, Mr. Sheild, to prepare an amendment in due and proper form. Because of short notice and the fact that this bill is being brought up by unanimous consent rather than under a rule, as had been anticipated, the amendment was not prepared in time to be inserted in the bill.

The amended section 2, as prepared by the clerk of the Appropriations Committee, is as follows:

SEC. 2. Any appropriations heretofore made and available for obligation during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1943, for carrying out the provisions of the Civilian Pilot Training Act of 1939, shall be available for carrying out the provisions of such act as amended hereby. Any obligations entered into heretofore under such appropriations for purposes which are brought within the scope of such section 2 by this amendatory act shall be deemed to be valid if otherwise properly incurred.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this amendment will be substituted for the present section 2 in the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The bill will certainly be considered under the 5-minute rule, of course.

Mr. FISH. Reserving the right to objest, Mr. Speaker, as I understand, this is a very minor piece of legislation. A rule was granted for its consideration. There is no disposition I know of to take up any time under the rule. If the gentleman is going to bring in this bill immediately and permit amendments under the 5-minute rule, I see no reason to call up the rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 1670), as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first sentence of section 2 of the Civilian Pilot Training Act of 1939, as amended, is amended by striking out the word "civilian."

SEC. 2. Any amounts heretofore appropriated for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Civilian Pilot Training Act of 1939, and unexpended, shall be available for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of such act, as amended by the provisions of this act.

Mr. LEA. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, the Civilian Pilot Training Act of 1939 provided for the training of civilian pilots. At that time it was contemplated to train civilians, recognizing that they might be of service to the Army, but that was not the primary purpose. After the war began, about the 1st of last July, the program was changed to provide for training men for military service. About the 1st of December an order was made preventing civilian enlistments. This meant that training of new men after that was confined to men who were in the service.

In January the War Department made an arrangement by which the civilian air training program was to include enlisted men on active service. Therefore, the new plan is to train only men who are in the service and on the active list. That is the program for the present.

In order to authorize this properly by law, it was necessary to strike out the word "civilian" so that the funds appropriated for training purposes under the Civilian Pilot Training Act would be applicable to the training that is continuing at the present time. That is the only purpose of the bill.

The section 2 referred to a moment ago is the one that would authorize the present appropriations to be available for the training under the act as here proposed to be amended.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. STEFAN. I think the House should know that this bill has as its purpose as it is written the allowing of the expenditure of C. A. A. funds for the training of military pilots in our civilian pilot-training set-up. That is, it includes a fund of approximately $25,000,000 which is controlled by the C. A. A. and which would be paid for this civilian pilot-training program.

On the other hand, the Navy also has a set-up in the civilian-pilot-training program through which it reimburses the C. A. A., and the appropriations for the naval program are reflected in the appropriation for the Navy.

Under this bill the C. A. A. would expend its funds for the training of Army personnel in the civilian-training program, and I understand since this bill has been written an agreement has been reached between the Army and the C. A. A. whereby the money for the training of these Army trainees in the civilian-pilot-training program will be paid out of the appropriations for the Army.

I have no objection to this bill. I think the bill is all right now.

Mr. LEA. The gentleman has made a correct statement.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Can the chairman of the committee give us a little more technical information with reference to the language in the closing sentence of the first paragraph on page 2? This is what I should like to determine. The report states:

> The 14,000 men to be given such training each month will be in addition to the numbers now being trained so that, all told, it is contemplated that a population of more than 30,000 men will be in training under these arrangements throughout the coming months.

As I understand that language, it means they can train as many as 30,000 a month.

Mr. LEA. That is the program expected when they get into operation.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is 30,000 per month, instead of a total of 30,000?

Mr. LEA. Yes. The instruction of a trainee may cover more than one of the progressive courses, each of which is short.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. I have just now discussed the subject of section 2 with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BULWINKLE]. While it is admitted that in all probability this language in the bill may do what the committee intends, in order not to hold up the bill at this time, and inasmuch as the amendment I referred to is not yet prepared, I shall not delay matters but let the bill go on to the Senate without objection or point of order, the idea being that in the Senate the amendment may be submitted.

Mr. LEA. I appreciate the attitude of the gentleman. I can say that the committee is indifferent as to the particular form of the section as long as it accomplishes the purpose. We will give attention with a view to meeting anything the gentleman has in mind when it comes to agreement with the Senate.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I should like to make an observation and not ask a question, if that is agreeable to the gentleman. I do it to bring to the attention of the House an dto have the record show that perhaps no civilian agency of the Federal Government more nearly set its program for wartime need in better or more effective motion than the Civil Aeronautics Administration through its civilian pilot-training program.

We must remember that prior to the entrance of America into this war the pilot-training program under the act of Congress, which was a far-sighted legislative proposal, had resulted in the training of thousands of young people who were funneled almost immediately into flight activities of the Army and the Navy.

I wish that Members of Congress could have the entire story of this amazing job in the mass production of pilots.

Actually, the Civil Aeronautics Administration has been training pilots for the defense of this country since 1939. Of all our civilian Government agencies, the C. A. A. was the first to go to war.

Its purpose was to make more American pilots, and thus to promote civil aviation, but at the same time to strengthen the national defense. The result was that when war came, we had nearly 100,000 licensed pilots in this country. Here, gentlemen, was a war weapon ready at hand. The reservoir of pilot material, before C. A. A. training began, was only 26,144 licensed pilots.

This production of pilots is the more remarkable when you consider that between 1903, when the Wright brothers successfully flew their frail craft at Kitty Hawk, and 1939, we had registered only 26,000 Americans who could fly. One year later, in 1940, this figure had jumped to 41,006, and by 1941, to 82,277. Then came the war, and we stepped up our production of pilots. By 1942, there were 104,876 civilian pilots and today, exclusive of thousands of pilots in the military services whose names do not appear on C. A. A. rolls, there are 110,510.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Without objection, the gentleman from California may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. LEA. I yield further to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The list of heroic Army and Navy flyers who received their start in the C. A. A. program is a long one. Capt. Joe Foss, the marine ace who has already surpassed Rickenbacker's World War record by bagging 26 Jap planes, learned to fly at Graham Aviation Service, a C. A. A. contract center in South Dakota. Of the 79 flyers with Jimmy Doolittle on his Tokyo raid, 19 had received C. A. A. training. Of the 17 Navy pilots in Fighting Squadron Six, which shot down 27 Jap planes in one engagement, 6 started flying under C. A. A. auspices. One could go on almost indefinitely in this fashion, for some 15,000 C. A. A. trainees had entered the Army and Navy air services even before Pearl Harbor.

The Civil Aeronautics Administration established this important war job in a strictly nonbureaucratic manner. All training was contracted to private individuals, to flight operators for teaching flying, and to colleges and educational institutions for giving ground school instruction. As a Government agency, it bought no planes, bought no airports, hired no instructors. It simply applied its vast experience to the supervision of the program to standardizing methods, equipment, curricula and, thus, assuring the continuous production of adequately trained men ready for their special combat training by the Army and Navy.

In this process, a great training organization has been built up all over the country—a truly American product. There are now some hundreds of training centers in this country, every one adequate and capable of starting our military pilots on the way to their specialized military training. Think what a meaning these training centers have when peacetime comes again—when aviation takes its place in our daily lives.

Of all the money we are spending today to win the war, this comparatively small amount spent to train our youth to fly is most certain to prove valuable in war as well as in peace.

Mr. LEA. What the gentleman has said is true, and a good deal more could be added.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I also commend the work of the C. A. A. and at the same time take occasion to call the attention of the Chairman to a comparatively minor situation that has developed as part of this training program. It has been called to my attention that some of the schools operating under the C. A. A., due primarily, according to their claim, to a lack of C. A. A. inspectors, are checking out their own students. There have been a few complaints in Connecticut that the interests of the school seem to be in having the program prolonged, and they refuse to check out the students, and insist that they need 3 or 4 or 5 or 6 hours' longer training. I wish the chairman would take that matter up, and see whether it is general or whether it is localized in Connecticut.

Mr. LEA. I did not catch quite all the gentleman said.

Mr. MILLER of Connecticut. Instead of having inspectors to check them out, employees of the schools are checking them out. It is said that it is to the interest of the schools to keep them there longer.

Mr. LEA. The problem is suffering from a lack of sufficient inspectors, and it is my belief that the number of inspectors will be increased. Many more are needed.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA. Yes.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks recently made, and include therein the amendment which I was expecting to offer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this subject in the Appendix of the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. There being no further debate, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

CONSTRUCTION OF CERTAIN PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 123, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of H. R. 1692, a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with the construction of certain public works, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] and yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, this is a rule making in order H. R. 1692, to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with the construction of certain public works, and for other purposes. The bill authorizes an expenditure of $1,256,607,000 for facilities for the operation of our Navy in this wartime. This money is made available, to be used largely in the discretion of naval authority, to those entrusted with the conduct of our Navy in time of war.

Mr. Speaker, the authorization of this vast sum of approximately a billion and a quarter of dollars for the furtherance of our naval and shore establishments, and for other purposes in connection therewith, is reminiscent of the fact that this country is making some real contributions to this unfortunate global war in which the civilized world finds itself embroiled, other than in terms of casualties. While ordinarily the sacrifices of war are thought of in terms of killed, wounded, and maimed, there is also the economic cost of war to be considered. And while we justly and rightly are prone to think of war sacrifices in the cost of blood, the economic cost to the country is not an insignificant thing.

In World War No. 1 this country made substantial contributions in the matter of dollars and the sinews of war, but not nearly so much as it is going to do in this war. At the close of that war we were contributing 36 percent of the total allied cost of the war. At the rate we are stepping up our contribution to that cause in this war it is safe to predict that before the war is over we will be contributing more than the total of all of our allies. Some interesting figures about what we are now contributing have been compiled. For instance, we are today contributing 61.9 percent of our entire national income, or a total of $78,000,000,000 up to date in World War No. 2; while the total contribution of Great Britain is 69.2 percent of its national income, which amounts in dollars to only $18,000,000,000. Add to this Canada's contribution of 45.4 percent of its national income — $2,997,000,000; Australia's 40.3 percent of its national income—$1,432,000,000; New Zealand's 63.4 percent of its national income—$430,000,000—and we have a grand total of $23,137,000,000 of contributions by the entire United Kingdom and its dominions as against the $78,000,000,000 from the United States. Moreover, it is estimated that before another year will have passed the total cost to the United States of this war will have reached the stupendous and staggering sum of $213,000,000,000.

The same sources estimate that by that time the total contribution of the British Empire will have been $88,000,000,000. Thus it is seen that the United States is and will continue to contribute the lion's share of the cost of World War No. 2 while the lion itself—Great Britain—will be a poor second. Certainly no European ally will ever again have the effrontery to refer to Uncle Sam as Uncle Shylock.

There is nothing to be gained by an extensive argument on the rule. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 minutes. As the gentleman from Mississippi has explained, this rule comes before the House with the unanimous report of the Committee on Rules, to make in order a bill from the Naval Affairs Committee authorizing the expenditure of $1,256,607,000 for public works, for the Navy, and for Navy facilities. However, it has a very unusual aspect and is one of the most extraordinary bills that has come before the Congress since I have been a Member during the last 22 years. I would not want this occasion to pass without commenting upon it. This rule makes in order a bill from the Naval Affairs Committee, introduced by the ranking minority member, the able gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS]. He was placed in charge of the hearings on the bill by the gentleman from Georgia, Chairman VINSON, and I understand the hearings were extensive and went down into the minutest details, and, further, that this bill is one of the most thoroughly considered bills ever brought before the House of Representatives. The distinguished chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], has established a precedent in the House of Representatives by turning such an important bill over to the ranking minority member of the committee, having him introduce it in his own name and placing him in charge of the hearings. I feel that this precedent that has been established in time of war is one that should be commended; that the chairman of the committee should be congratulated because of his fairness and wisdom in time of war in placing a minority member in charge of an important bill, because all of us on both sides, Republicans and Democrats, have one objective, and that is to do everything in our power to expedite final victory. We are all pulling our weight in the same boat to all-out victory, and the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, recognizing this situation, has established a precedent that can well be followed by other committees, particularly those committees that have anything to do with the war work, such as the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. I would not want this to go by without some mention of the fact that the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee has voluntarily established a precedent in the House that could be very properly copied by other committees during the war. The gentleman from Georgia, Chairman VINSON, should be commended for his broad-gaged statesmanship, for his liberality, for his nonpartisanship, and intelligent leadership, because that all goes to make for national unity, unity in his committee, and unity in the House of Representatives, and I hope that other Members will appreciate it.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. May it not also lead to making the ranking minority Member become experienced in handling the affairs of the committee?

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad the gentleman raised that issue. There is no good reason why it should not be done extensively in other committees, even in the Committee on Agriculture. On the other hand, everyone knows that there is a close line-up in the House and that the Republicans, in conjunction with constitutional Democrats, have a large majority. This is not a controversial bill and, therefore, it was not done for political purposes. It was done out of a sense of fairness, purely because the chairman of the committee thought it was in the interest of national unity in wartime. For that reason I have taken this opportunity to commend and congratulate the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], for setting a fine example of cooperation in our war efforts to all Members of the House.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1692) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with the construction of certain public works, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 1692, with Mr. MERRITT in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be printed at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to establish or develop the following naval shore activities by the construction of such temporary or permanent public works as he may consider necessary, including buildings, facilities, accessories, and services, with which shall be included the authority to acquire the necessary land, and to continue or complete the construction of any project heretofore authorized or undertaken, which projects have been specifically approved by the Secretary of the Navy, with approximate costs as indicated: Fleet facilities, $67,900,000; aviation facilities, $238,000,000; storage facilities, $5,350,000; liquid-fuel storage, $10,350,000; Marine Corps training facilities, $33,132,000; ordnance storage facilities, $50,000,000; personnel training and housing facilities, $33,700,000; hospital facilities, $66,005,000; shore radio facilities, $3,500,000; Naval Research Laboratory, $750,000; miscellaneous structures, $33,000,000; passive defense, $15,000,000; advance bases, $720,000,000; miscellaneous and unforeseen facilities, $223,313,000: Provided, That the approximate cost indicated for each of the classes of projects enumerated above may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, be varied upward or downward but the total cost shall not exceed $1,500,000,000.

SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to effectuate the purposes of this act.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 2, strike out the figures "238,000,000" and substitute therefor "223,000,000."

Page 2, lines 9 and 10, strike out the following: "; miscellaneous and unforeseen facilities, $223,313,000."

Page 2, strike out line 14, and substitute therefor the following: "$1,256,607,000: Provided further, That prior to the acquisition, by lease or otherwise, of any land under authority of this act, the Secretary of the Navy shall report to the Senate and House Naval Affairs Committees all such prospective acquisitions."

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, this is an administration measure. It was sent to the Speaker of the House by the Secretary of the Navy, and by the Speaker transferred to the Naval Affairs Committee. When the bill reached the committee I requested, on behalf of the Naval Affairs Committee, that the distinguished minority member, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS] should introduce the bill, which he did, and when the hearing was had I asked the gentleman from Minnesota to become acting chairman of the committee and to conduct the hearing on the bill.

I wish to take this opportunity to state that I have adopted the policy on these departmental bills of giving them to the various members of the committee, instead of the chairman introducing all of the bills. A few days ago the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DREWRY] presented to the House a bill from the Naval Affairs Committee. Today the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS] will present this bill on behalf of the Naval Affairs Committee.

I want to commend the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS] on the magnificent report he has filed. I invite every member of the committee to carefully consider the report and it will give you the full details about the bill.

I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman, and will ask my distinguished colleague from Minnesota, who so ably conducted the hearing on this bill for 4 days, to explain the bill to the membership of the committee.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 20 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the distinguished chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee [Mr. VINSON] for his comments, and also for the opportunity of presiding over the Naval Affairs Committee, thereby giving me a much better opportunity to more fully study every detail of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is before us as an integral part of the program of the expansion of the Navy, which is already national policy. It simply implements the expansion of the seagoing Navy by providing in an orderly manner the shore facilities that are necessary for the expansion of the fleet itself.

The committee went into every detail of the bill and eliminated a number of items or parts of items. In all, the committee reduced the amount of the authorization by $243,393,000. It is quite possible that some or all of that may have to be asked for later, but at this time the committee felt that those amounts were not justified as a part of the present program. Later, as the program does expand, if the war lasts longer than we expect, we may have to come back and authorize those items that are now eliminated. But by having eliminated them now we are assured of only the most essential construction taking place, that part which is absolutely essential to provide shore facilities necessary for the expanded fleet and to provide for them in a time schedule, so that they will be ready as the new ships of the Navy are commissioned and need shore facilities.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Are the projects authorized by this bill for the immediate construction?

Mr. MAAS. Yes; they are all authorized for immediate construction. That does not mean that every item in the bill can be built starting the day after the bill becomes law, nor the day after they get the appropriation, but it is a program designed for this coming calendar year, all of which it is necessary to start at least the plans if not the actual construction now, so that there will be orderly progression of making these facilities ready as the fleet needs them.

The committee reduced the amounts of items where there was not a concrete program for the requested authorization. Every dollar requested in this bill that now remains represents a definite program. It is part of a whole, and everything that has been left in the bill is essential for immediate consideration. It would be foolish to have provided for expansion of the fleet as we have and then not have the facilities necessary to operate that fleet.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I note on page 2, beginning in line 16, the following:

Provided further, That prior to the acquisition, by lease or otherwise, of any land under authority of this act, the Secretary of the Navy shall report to the Senate and House Naval Affairs Committees all such prospective acquisitions.

I am just wondering if it is necessary for the Army and Navy to report to the committees what they propose to do, and then get authority from those committees as to whether or not purchases may be made, under the language there contained, which seems to me a very good provision.

Mr. MAAS. I shall be very happy to explain that situation. There has been a growing apprehension relative to the military services going into the real-estate business. Of necessity, they have become very large holders of land. While we do not want to deny them anything that is essential to carry on the successful prosecution of the war, our committee is very hopeful, in the case of the Navy, that the Navy shall lease wherever possible instead of acquiring title to land which it will have forever after.

We do not want to remove any more land than we can possibly help from the tax rolls of the various counties and States, which is done when the Navy acquires the title. We feel that while we must allow discretion to the Navy in the selection of sites, that at least we should know what they are doing, we should be familiar with their expansion program, and particularly where land is acquired. We are not imposing any restriction on them; we are granting in this bill the authority to acquire the land, but we are saying that they shall make a report to our committee before they actually consummate the deal and give to the Congress the right of veto. If the proposal is made on something that we do not deem essential, we think before the deal is finally consummated we should have the right to act on it affirmatively.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Then it does require House and Senate approval for the acquisition of property?

Mr. MAAS. It would take affirmative action on the part of the Congress if we wished to disapprove it. If we take no action whatever, then the purchase is made. This gives us an opportunity to control things a little more closely. We also felt that those charged with the responsibility of this program, particularly in the matter of the acquisition of land, would be doubly careful about any purchase they made if they knew they had to report to the Congress and that it would be subject to scrutiny. We think we have thrown sufficient safeguards around the authority so they will not run wild in the acquisition of land.

In this connection I am going to place in the RECORD a letter sent to the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, signed by the Secretary of the Navy, assuring us that no such land would be acquired without consulting the committee. In this same connection a little further in the bill there is a section on air-transport facilities. I might explain at this time that I will put a letter in the RECORD at the proper point that upon the request of the committee the Secretary of the Navy wrote us assuring us that he would not actually consummate or make any irrevocable commitments in the matter of new air-transport terminals without consulting further with the committee when the program is more completely worked out. We are not restricting his authority, but we are going to be kept informed, and, again, we have the right of veto if we feel that they should not proceed with any specific project.

Mr. COLE of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that particular point?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. COLE of New York. Can the gentleman tell us what new locations are presently being considered by the Navy Department?

Mr. MAAS. I do not quite get the gentleman's full question. There was a little confusion in the Chamber.

Mr. COLE of New York. The gentleman stated he had received a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to the effect that the Navy would not go ahead with the construction of any new naval air transport stations without express authority from the committee, and I ask the gentleman what new stations the Navy is now considering.

Mr. MAAS. I can answer the question, but I yield to the distinguished chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman from Minnesota may answer if he cares to.

Mr. COLE of New York. I make these inquiries only for the purpose of the record so we may have an understanding of the Navy Department's intentions.

Mr. MAAS. The gentleman's question relates to the present construction of facilities for naval air transport. I may say that this is the first time in any legislation there has appeared any reference to the naval air transport service which has been established by the Navy. It does not mean that this is a new service. Heretofore they have used other existing facilities, but the service has gained in importance and size to the point where they feel they must have their own separate facilities. This is in fact an air service to deliver critical supplies throughout the world, wherever the Navy may need them. I would answer the gentleman's question by stating that the fields presently under consideration are in New York, Miami, Kansas, on the Patuxent River in Maryland, in the San Francisco Bay area, at Seattle, and at Treasure Island in California.

Mr. COLE of New York. May I ask the gentleman what is the total cost as presently estimated?

Mr. MAAS. The estimate furnished us by the Navy Department was $40,000,000.

Mr. COLE of New York. I would direct the gentleman's attention to the report, page 14, in which these items are set forth under "Aviation facilities," table 2. Under the item "Naval air transport expansion" we see an item of one new station at a cost of $10,000,000 and an expansion of six stations at a cost of $30,000,000.

It was my impression from the hearings before the committee that there were to be three new major stations, two on the Atlantic coast and one on the Pacific, which would cost $10,000,000 each; that those were the three on which no action would be taken until further approval by the committee.

Mr. MAAS. I should be pleased to read the letter from the Secretary at this point.

Mr. COLE of New York. I am simply asking as to the information which has been given to the committee. It would appear from the gentleman's statement that we are to have one new station and an expansion of six existing stations.

Mr. MAAS. The program they asked for did not include only new stations. We have a station at Treasure Island, for instance; we have a station at Seattle, and there is to be a new station at New York.

Mr. COLE of New York. And a new station at Miami.

Mr. MAAS. It was not a new station. It would be an extension of existing facilities.

Mr. COLE of New York. Oh, yes.

Mr. MAAS. It was not a new station.

Mr. COLE of New York. It is not to be in connection with or operated in connection with any present facilities.

Mr. MAAS. Yes; because the Coast Guard is contiguous and we now operate the Coast Guard.

Mr. COLE of New York. Not in naval air transport work.

Mr. MAAS. No. None of these are exclusively for naval air transport at the present time. They are an expansion of existing facilities that are other than naval air transport.

Mr. COLE of New York. The purpose of my inquiry is to have it definitely understood as to what items the Department is going to report back to the committee before any action is taken.

Mr. MAAS. They will report on the whole program before any final commitment is made.

Mr. COLE of New York. The whole naval air transport problem?

Mr. MAAS. Yes; as to facilities.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I would suggest that the gentleman read the letter from the Secretary on air transport.

Mr. MAAS. Yes. I will read the letter from the Secretary of the Navy to the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. It is dated February 17, 1943, and is as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 17, 1943.

Hon. CARL VINSON,
Chairman, Naval Affairs Committee,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I am informed that in the course of the hearings on H. R. 1692, "A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with the construction of certain public works, and for other purposes," some concern was expressed by the committee with respect to the proposed construction of certain facilities for the development of the naval air transport service.

The program of facilities for this service is still in the formative stage. We have determined that certain facilities must be provided to accommodate the great expansion in this service. We also know the general locations in which the proposed facilities should be constructed. However, the specific details and the exact locations in the general areas will depend upon the results of surveys now in progress.

It is my understanding that the committee accepted these projects with the understanding that when the details have been worked out they will be discussed with the committee before final commitments are made. This arrangement is satisfactory to me.

Very truly yours,

FRANK KNOX.

The chairman to which he refers in this case is the acting chairman, myself. May I state to the House that my purpose in pursuing that line during the hearings on this bill was because I wanted, and the committee was of like mind, the committee having stated a policy to the Navy, that wherever transport facilities were to be constructed, that they should have in mind the post-war potentialities of such facilities. We did not want them to simply build during the war some temporary stations that would be thrown away when the war is over. We wanted them wherever possible to extend the existing facilities, and that any new construction that should be so located that it would be so constructed with the thought in mind of its potential use as a part of the commercial air system when the war is over.

Mr. COLE of New York. With further regard to these naval air transport commitments, the gentleman will agree that this procedure the committee is adopting today is rather unusual in technically authorizing the creation of naval facilities but holding a string on the actual operations by requiring the Navy Department to come back to the committee for further approval. Is it the gentleman's understanding and can he assure the committee and the House that when the Department reports back to the committee its plans, as authorized by this bill, so far as naval air transport service is concerned, that the committee will immediately be advised of that report and hearings will be held on the report?

Mr. MAAS. I am quite certain that the gentleman can be assured of that. Of course, the chairman, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], will be in charge and the report will be made to him, but our understanding is that that will immediately be transmitted to the full committee and they will be given an opportunity in session to discuss the said report before any final action is taken by the Navy Department.

Mr. HINSHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. I am very glad to know that the committee is expressing concern, and has concern, for the location of such transport airports in view of their possible ultimate use by the civil air transport services. I would like to ask the gentleman, in setting up a global air-line service or a global air transport service in the Navy, does that in any wise conflict with the Army's similar program or are they cooperating in setting up these lines?

Mr. MAAS. They are cooperating and they are not in conflict. The Navy must have an uninterrupted service, a fast source of supply of critical material that must be flexible because the Navy stations move. Sea warfare is quite different. The Army must have its system because it has fixed bases that remain in a chain and in a system a relatively long period of time. We cannot put the dependence of one upon the other. There is no conflict between the two at all.

Mr. HINSHAW. Is there any sense in setting up duplicating lines or parallel lines to given places or will they operate only one or the other of the lines or a joint line?

Mr. MAAS. We cannot say that both can always operate by using the joint line, because at any time the Navy may have to move overnight to an entirely different system of islands. If it depended on a joint line it would not have the flexibility that is necessary. However, they do work together when they are running over parallel routes, and on that part of the joint route which is parallel, and they do cooperate, but we cannot restrict them to just one line without destroying the flexibility that is necessary.

Mr. HINSHAW. The gentleman does not quite understand me.

Mr. MAAS. I think I understand the gentleman thoroughly.

Mr. HINSHAW. Would it not be entirely within reason that when a Navy plane is going to a joint Army-Navy destination and if it is not fully loaded, it might also carry Army material.

Mr. MAAS. I can assure the gentleman it does. They cooperate perfectly when they are on a joint part of the route, but we must still run both services over that same joint route because of the necessity of shifting one service at any time to a different route. But I can assure the gentleman that the Army planes and Navy planes carry each other's cargo whenever feasible.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr MAAS. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. I notice on page 13 of the report, under fleet facilities, which is one of the large items in this bill, about $67,000,000 provided. Is the gentleman at liberty to advise the committee what portion, if any, of the fleet facilities will be beyond either continental or insular United States?

Mr. MAAS. No; I cannot tell the gentleman because we do not know and nobody knows at the present time. We do not know, nor does the Navy, the exact location. We know what our operations in general terms are going to be for the next period. We know that the expansion of the Navy will require so many repair bases and so many operations bases. As the theater of war shifts, the locations will have to shift. But we know that we need the facilities that are authorized no matter where they may be. The vast bulk of them will doubtless be outside our continental limits.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I think there is some confusion as to just what the Secretary of the Navy must report back to the House and Senate committees. My interpretation of this bill, aside from the letter—and I want the gentleman to correct me if I am wrong, because he thoroughly understands the case and is making a very fine explanation of the bill, for which he should be congratulated—is that the only matter upon which the Secretary of the Navy shall report to the Senate and House Committees on Naval Affairs is the purchase or lease of land for the purpose of building these bases.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

That is by restriction in the legislation itself. The other matter which I have just discussed, a letter concerning which I have read, is an agreement and understanding with the Secretary that he will not make final, irrevocable commitments on the establishment of the air-transport bases without first discussing the matter with the committee. If it sees fit to object to it, the committee can pass legislation prohibiting it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. What I am getting at is this. The bill itself restricts the report back to the lease or purchase of land.

Mr. MAAS. In regard to the air transport it may not involve either. It may involve only construction. But we feel that we want a voice in determining where these projects shall be located, even if they involve merely expansion of existing facilities without the acquisition of land.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I think the gentleman is correct about that; the Congress should have the last say.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HINSHAW. Has any discussion been had with the Navy Department regarding foreign bases that may be built for transport aviation?

Mr. MAAS. Yes. I may say to the gentleman that the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs has appointed a subcommittee to study that entire matter and to confer continually with the Navy and report back to our committee on it. I think we will have a very decided voice in that matter, and we will keep the House informed of the progress.

Mr. HINSHAW. I think the gentleman understands what I have in mind, although I shall not pursue the question.

Mr. MAAS. Yes.

We cut out an item of $4,500,000 from the Marine Corps appropriation. This involves a very important matter. This appropriation was requested to establish facilities to train the Marine Corps' share of the illiterates in the service. This is a matter on which we may have to take some legislative action. The committee took the only action it could by striking this item from the bill.

It seemed to the committee utterly ridiculous that we should set up three duplicating systems of education for the considerable number of illiterates we get under the operation of the Selective Service System, who must be given a primary education before they can be useful to the military services.

Under the present order of the manpower director, the Army takes its share of these men and the Navy and the Marine Corps each have to take their share. Each is then required to provide extensive new educational facilities. Four million five hundred thousand dollars would be required to set up temporary schools to train the Marine Corps' share of the illiterates. That also represents a depletion of the manpower of the Marine Corps. It actually reduces the authorized strength of the Marine Corps, because a great many marines are required to help educate these illiterates, and the instructors and whatever illiterates they get are to that extent a reduction from the effective fighting strength of the Marine Corps, which is presumed to be a combatant organization, with everybody in it available for immediate front-line duty.

It seemed to us utterly ridiculous that with the Army setting up a great system of education for these illiterates we should compel the Marine Corps and the Navy to take a share of them and then set up duplicating systems of education. So our committee dealt with the matter as far as we could go by striking out the item for the Marine Corps providing for training illiterates, hoping that that would make the Manpower Commission see the light and not thrust upon the Marine Corps a share of the illiterates, as that would serve no useful purpose in that organization.

In another section dealing with the training of the women reserves of the Navy, the WAVES, we struck out $580,000 because we felt this training was being concentrated in too few educational institutions. It was our desire, and we felt it reflected the views of the rest of the Congress and the country, that this educational training of the WAVES should be dispersed as much as possible to the smaller colleges. Otherwise, many very valuable educational institutions of small size are going to be forced to collapse, which would be an irreparable loss to the Nation. Many of them may never be able to open again. There would be very little difference in the cost as between concentrating the training of the WAVES and distributing them to the smaller colleges, but even if it cost a little more we felt that the ultimate cost to the national economy would be far less than under the present system. So we struck out $580,000, with instructions to the Navy to distribute their WAVES training a little more widely and contract with more smaller colleges.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. For the RECORD, will the gentleman supply figures showing the amount of land to which the Navy now has title and the amount of land to which it expects to get title under this bill?

Mr. MAAS. The gentleman's question is very pertinent. However, the list is too long to read during my time. I have here a document which has been made a public document and which I will make a part of the RECORD.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to include this table in my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

The document referred to is as follows:

[1] Refund. [2] Interest.

Mr. MAAS. That is exactly the information the gentleman desires. Also, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to include at this point a letter dated February 22, by the Secretary of the Navy, to the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? There was no objection.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 22, 1943.

The CHAIRMAN,
Naval Affairs Committee,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: My attention has been called to the amendment to the pending bill to authorize certain public works, H. R. 1692, the amendment being as follows:

"Provided further, That prior to the acquisition, by lease or otherwise, of any land under authority of this act, the Secretary of the Navy shall report to the Senate and House Naval Affairs Committees all such prospective acquisitions."

It is my understanding that this amendment has been proposed in order to avoid the necessity of having specific legislative authorization for each individual acquisition of land. I understand further that the committee understands from the wording of the amendment that the Department will come into the agreement with the Naval Affairs Committees of the House and Senate with respect to acquisitions before final commitments are made. This procedure is acceptable to me.

Sincerely yours,

FRANK KNOX.

Mr. MAAS. The bill also provides that the approximate cost indicated for each category may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, be varied upward or downward but that the total cost shall not exceed $1,256,607,000. The committee is of the opinion that this flexibility is necessary in order to permit the authorizations herein contained being effectively carried out, thus allowing for changes as the military situation may develop.

The first committee amendment reduces the sum authorized to be appropriated for aviation facilities by $15,000,000, from $238,000,000 to $223,000,000. This reduction was determined upon since the need for the money involved is entirely problematical. The necessity for this sum will depend upon whether the Navy Department later decides that an additional primary training base is required. If such need should arise, the committee will be available to give immediate consideration to a request for legislation to provide therefor.

I have already discussed the second and third amendments, dealing, respectively, with illiterate training in the Marine Corps, and the WAVE training.

The fourth amendment deletes entirely the item of $223,313,000 for "Miscellaneous and unforeseen facilities." The committee understands that the Navy Department has no program outlined, or in view, which would require the sum sought under this heading, but that it was intended to have this amount available to meet unforeseen contingencies. It was the consensus of the committee that, since the wording of this bill provides flexibility to permit the shifting of the funds provided therein from one category of projects to another, the Navy Department would have ample time to come before the committee and present its needs for such additional amount if the occasion therefor should arise.

The fifth amendment corrects the total sum authorized by this bill to conform to the reductions recommended by the committee. It also includes a proviso requiring the Secretary of the Navy to report to the Senate and House Naval Affairs Committees all prospective acquisitions of land under the authority conferred by this bill.

The funds requested under this heading provide for the expansion of existing operational aviation stations, expansion of existing aviation training stations, further development of a naval air transport service, and the expansion of lighter-than-air bases in the continental limits of the United States. The air program has been greatly expanded during the fiscal year 1943, and the current program calls for a continuation of the shore facilities to meet the present increased operating pilot procurement plan and plane operating plan. The committee was informed, during the exhaustive hearings conducted on the bill, that there remains unexpended under the act of August 6, 1942—Public Law 700, Seventy-seventh Congress—the sum of $70,000,000 for aviation facilities. Accordingly, upon enactment of this bill, there will be available for this purpose a total of $293,000,000.

Since complete new air stations and air facilities are included in the program, the individual items for construction will include all of those required in such establishments. These are principally runways, grading, drainage, roads, walks, taxiways, parking areas, hangars, shops, administration buildings, control towers, storage of all kinds, officers' and men's living quarters and messing facilities, communications, fire protection, and purchase of land. The funds to be spent for each of these projects will not be in the same proportion as in previous construction since the greater part of this program contemplates the expansion of existing stations to a greater extent than heretofore. Following this plan a greater proportion of construction will be in facilities such as barracks, bachelor officers' quarters, shops, parking areas, storage, and accompanying utilities.

This general method of providing for required expansion is applicable to operating stations, training stations, and to some extent the program listed under "Aircraft transportation service." The "Lighter than air" item is a program for development outside the continental limits and in areas where no lighter-than-air facilities now exist and will therefore require complete new construction. The proportionate amount to be used for individual items will therefore conform to that usually found in a new development.

It is estimated that it will be necessary to acquire 15,000 acres of land at a cost of $1,500,000 to provide the facilities authorized under this class of projects.

In the break-down furnished the committee under this heading, there is one item not specifically provided for previously; that is, "Naval air transport service." The committee desires to emphasize, however, that this does not mean that a new service is being initiated but merely that the present one, which has proved of tremendous value to our far-flung naval forces, is being augmented to meet the greatly increased demands for such service. The committee is informed, in this connection, that the Navy Department has heretofore utilized the Pan American Airways to the maximum extent possible, and intends to continue to do so. Its facilities will still be limited even after the expansion which this bill will provide, and, in addition, there are various routes which it does not traverse. It is vital in the prosecution of the global war to be able to afford passenger and freight service by air. This service also is instrumental in maintaining the proper morale in that it provides a means of transporting the mail to the naval forces at distant points. There is no other possible way to assure such uninterrupted service than by providing the expansion contemplated by this item.

It is understood that in extending the facilities for this service, the Navy Department will give consideration to the desirability of making the expansions in a way that will enable such facilities to dovetail into our commercial needs after the war.

The program of repair, beyond the scope of maintenance forces, includes repairs, painting, and rehabilitation of buildings, appurtenances, and accessories; overhaul and repairs to ventilating devices, elevators, floors, walls, ceilings, and lighting fixtures; repair and replacement of steam and water lines; repair and replacement of power lines; repair and overhaul of power tools and maintenance machinery; and repairs to roads, walks, and grounds.

At present there are 16 hospitals of temporary construction. These temporary structures are necessarily built of the cheapest available materials; construction will require considerable repair. There are 15 permanent naval hospitals, the capacity of which has been doubled and, in some cases, tripled by the addition of temporary construction. Although the permanent structures in institutions of this group will require only the planned upkeep, the temporary structures will require considerable upkeep, due to type of structure.

To parallel the increases in naval personnel, it is necessary to continue the program of development of hospital facilities by new construction, extensions of existing facilities, or by acquisition of existing structures. A total of approximately 60,000 hospital beds will be required to serve the hospitalization needs for the planned total of personnel.

Upon completion of the current Public Works program, a total of 40,000 beds in naval hospitals will be realized. It will be necessary to provide an additional 20,000 beds during the fiscal year 1944. Since the existent hospitals are capable of limited expansion only, it will be necessary to provide these additional facilities in new developments.

It will be impracticable to state all of the specific area in which these new facilities will be required. Some locations depend entirely upon future developments.

It is estimated that it will be necessary to acquire 300 acres of land at a cost of $30,000 to provide the facilities authorized under this class of projects.

PASSIVE DEFENSE

Passive defense ..... $15,000,000

This item provides for the continuation of the program of passive defense, including camouflage, black-out, security, and other like facilities. The program being materially reduced over that originally contemplated, it is believed that the figure of $15,000,000 will carry the work forward during the fiscal year 1944.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DREWRY].

Mr. DREWRY. Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary to go into detail in respect to this bill. This report, as the chairman has stated, is a splendid report and it takes up every detail in the bill. I shall not take up the time, therefore, of the Committee by going into particulars. The committee cut down considerably the amount of money that was requested by the Navy, thus proving that the Committee on Naval Affairs is in favor of economy, as well as efficiency. This bill has been brought to your attention after a great deal of study, and a great deal of hard work upon it. I hope the bill will pass.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY].

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope very much that none of the money authorized to be appropriated by this bill will be used for painted ships on painted oceans, or for wooden guns. Saturday afternoon I took it upon myself to make a little investigation of the fortifications around the House Office Building. In broad open daylight, with civilian clothes on, I climbed to the top of the New House Office Building, and there inspected the great fortifications erected for the protection of the membership of this House. I went there because of my curiosity. I had been unable to determine the caliber or character of the guns which have been placed there. And here comes the story. We are being protected by wooden guns and decoy soldiers—believe it or not. Those guns are made of wood, and the soldiers are decoys. Under high heaven why have they been placed over our heads? I am somewhat of a duck hunter. When I put out my decoys, I expect to attract live ducks, and if I should put out wooden guns, I certainly would expect to attract live enemy planes. There is no effort made to camouflage those guns. They are sitting there under the blue sky, for every plane that comes and goes to see. Gentlemen, it was a gruesome sight.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS. Would the gentleman not rather have wooden guns there, and let the soldiers have the real guns? We do not need the guns.

Mr. COOLEY. Yes; but I submit that this is a serious situation. It is serious to have decoys over our heads. I call attention also to the fact that we are protected by well-trained soldiers, and there I was in plain daylight, in civilian clothes, climbing to the House Office Building roof and nobody stopped me and nobody fired at me. After 5 o'clock in the afternoon we go to our offices, and when we walk in the front door a soldier says, "Halt, show me your pass." I have been going in and out that same door for almost 9 years. I show my pass at the main door, and I venture to say that there are at least a dozen other doors that are wholly unprotected. I suppose they think that all saboteurs will walk in the front door, and none will go in the back door of the House Office Building, where we must conduct our business. I call this to the attention of the House because I think it is downright serious. Just a few minutes ago I asked a member of the Military Affairs Committee if he could tell me the caliber of the guns on top of the House Office Building, and he said, "Yes; they are .50-caliber antiaircraft guns." I said, "Are you sure, John?" He said, "Yes."

Mr. Chairman, if the Military Affairs Committee does not know anything about it, I am just wondering how many wooden guns we have around here. If they are going to place decoys up there, pray tell me why did they not put a great big gun up there? They would have just utilized a little more wood.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOLEY. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am not much concerned about how many wooden guns, but how many wooden Congressmen they have got around here.

Mr. COOLEY. Those decoys would probably indicate we have some lame ducks in Congress. I think the time has come when the Members of this House ought to know what is being done around this city of Washington. It is unfortunate that this city, the Capital of the greatest republic of the earth, is being protected by wooden guns and decoy soldiers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested to hear this dicussion about wooden guns and wooden soldiers. The Congress is just a part of our system of government. There are three separate and independent branches of government. I wonder if anybody in the House could advise us whether they have wooden guns and wooden soldiers protecting the other two branches or departments of the government, or whether we are just selected for this particular special privilege? I wonder what protection the Supreme Court gets and the other department of the Government without even mentioning it by name.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. We have heard a good deal about wooden guns and wooden soldiers, but is not the real danger from wooden heads?

Mr. FISH. I think the gentleman is right—wooden heads and bureaucratic government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time to discuss an aviation project for our Navy. For 15 years I have been urging that the cadets at West Point be trained in military aviation. About a year ago the Army took over and developed the Stewart airfield in my district, a few miles outside of Newburgh. The actual flying training of the cadets began last spring and has proved a great success. I am told by General Wilby, in command at West Point, that it far exceeds his highest expectations in training the cadets to fly. Having this in mind, I introduced a bill on the first day of this session, January 6, urging that the same kind of aviation training be inaugurated at the Naval Academy at Annapolis. I asked the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], on the 29th of January for a hearing on my bill. He replied on the 30th of January, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., January 30, 1943.

Hon. HAMILTON FISH,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FISH: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of January 29 enclosing House Joint Resolution 21 providing for aviation training for midshipmen at the United States Naval Academy, which you introduced.

It does not require legislation for the Naval Academy to give aviation instruction to midshipmen. However, I am advocating that an airfie'd be built at Annapolis and that the midshipmen be given instruction in aerodynamics as well as being trained to qualify as aviators, as I believe that all of the students at the Naval Academy should be trained in this branch of the Navy.

With kindest regards, I am,

Yours very truly,

CARL VINSON,

I want to ask the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee if he could give the House any information as to what progress is being made to locate an air field near Annapolis in order to train midshipmen to fly, similar to the way West Point cadets are being trained at the Stewart airfield near Newburgh?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. In response to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], I want to advise the House that in this very bill $10,000,000 is being made available for the construction of a new airfield at or adjacent to Annapolis for the purpose of giving complete instruction at the Naval Academy.

Mr. FISH. I thank the gentleman very much. I am sure that such aviation training of the midshipmen at Annapolis will be a great benefit and service to our Navy. My one regret is that it has not been done before, it may now be too late to perfect them in flying for this war.

According to the gentleman from Georgia, the provisions in the pending bill take care of the bill that I introduced and it will go into effect immediately?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Just as soon as this bill becomes law it is the intention of the Bureau of Yards and Docks to commence construction of a $10,000,000 airport at Annapolis.

Mr. FISH. I think the House will be very much interested to know that the training of the West Point cadets to fly at Stewart Field about 10 miles distant, has proven highly successful; so much so that the officers at West Point tell me that has been the greatest advance made at the Military Academy in the last 100 years.

I am very glad that Annapolis is about to follow suit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I am taking this time to just sort of emphasize and elaborate upon some remarks made by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] on the opening of the debate on this rule.

First of all, I want to congratulate the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs for causing this administration bill to be brought before the House in the manner in which it has been. It shows his broad-mindedness and shows his great Americanism, to distribute the honors on both sides of the aisle. In giving the handling of the bill to the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS] he showed again, as he has on many occasions, his great liberal spirit of Americanism, and as far as he is concerned, during this war there is no division between Democrats and Republicans.

I want to emphasize a remark I made upon the floor of this House the other day, going a little further along the line that the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] pursued this morning, when a distinguished Member of this House, whose remarks may have been provoked by another Member's observation, was recalling the many things he had said 5 years ago, to show that he was right then and some others were wrong. I stated at that time that I did not know any good purpose to be served by rehashing, going over issues and going over controversies and going over differences of opinion that existed in this country prior to Pearl Harbor.

There were those who believed that in order to defend our country an Army, Navy, and Air Corps were necessary to have here. There were those who believed that we should have these three military factors and send them to Europe. Those were the two schools of thought. Now what good can be served by bringing those matters up? Who was wrong makes no difference. History may tell us sometime. Future generations may be the arbiter of that question but leave it alone now. This Nation today is in a fight for its existence. There is no room among us now for nagging.

It is my belief that the less we bring up those matters on which we were then divided, the better; in other words, the less we talk about matters upon which we were divided, the better, and the more loyal we shall be to our country and to our boys who are scattered on every sea and in every land on the face of the earth fighting and dying for the cause for which we entered this war. I believe that whenever we do or say anything that causes disunity in however slight a degree, we break faith with the boys who are fighting for us. So again I say, Mr. Chairman, the less we talk about controversial matters that were buried away on December 7, 1941, the greater will be our service to our country and her sons. I do not believe there is a Member of this House on either side of the aisle that has not but one purpose in his mind—to win this war as quickly as it can be won with the least possible loss of life and treasure. This is the reason I wanted to take the time to say these few words. What difference does it make who was right and who was wrong? We are all one today and we must stay one; and the way to stay one is to forget those matters that had better be forgotten. Quit talking so much and do more acting. It is no time for talk, to make headlines—and it is no time for horseplay.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE].

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. PACE. In view of the general interest on the part of the membership, I have secured now and should like to read the release with reference to wheat quotas issued by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Secretary of Agriculture Claude R. Wickard today suspended wheat-marketing quotas in a new move to insure adequate feed supplies for the huge livestock and poultry production programs.

The Secretary's action, taken under the authority of the emergency provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, lifts marketing quotas for the remainder of the 1942-43 marketing year and for 1943-44, and releases at once for feed on market any wheat which has been stored off the market because of the quota.

At the same time the Secretary announced that wheat farmers who in 1943 meet 90 percent of their farm war-crop goals will be eligible for Agricultural Adjustment Administration wheat payments and wheat loans, even though they exceed their wheat allotments.

I should stop there to state, because so many Members have asked about it, that this is a positive statement that farmers who have met 90 percent of their war-crop goals will be eligible not only for wheat loans but the producers will receive their payments.

This provision, it was pointed out, will enable wheat farmers, in areas where other crops are not so successfully grown, to increase their wheat production.

The Secretary urged wheat farmers, however, to maintain careful farming practices so as not to jeopardize future wheat crops. He recalled the wind and water erosion and resultant low yields that have followed excessive acreage increases in the past.

"With three good wheat years behind us, our wheat supplies at the present time are the largest in our history," Secretary Wickard said. "In view of the tremendous increase in the number of livestock, however, additional feed reserves are a safeguard for the future.

"We entered the present marketing year with a total wheat supply of 1,613,000,000 bushels. At the same time this year wheat consumption, including moderate exports, promises to be the largest since 1920. And it must be remembered that in 1920 our gross exports totaled 369,000,000 bushels.

"Livestock feeding has accounted for the bulk of the current increase in wheat consumption. With some increase expected in the quantity used for food, and substantial quantities being used for alcohol production, our total domestic consumption is expected to be the largest in history."

The 1942-43 marketing quota was made effective following a referendum of wheat growers May 2, 1942, and the 1943-44 quota was proclaimed August 6, 1942. The 1943-44 quota referendum which was to have been held this spring is canceled by today's announcement.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PACE. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I think the gentleman from Georgia should be congratulated for the splendid fight he has made, not only in the committee, but also on the floor of the House, for the farmers not alone of his district, but for the farmers of America generally, for the farmers in my own section particularly, the wheat growers.

What the gentleman from Georgia has just said with reference to production of wheat gives us encouragement, for in our State, while we have had a surplus of wheat, at the present time it is disappearing and disappearing fast because we are feeding it to livestock. I think the Secretary of Agriculture did a very wise thing this morning when he lifted the restrictions, because we are not only going to have a shortage of many foodstuffs but we are going to have a shortage of corn, and our wheat surplus will be used to take up the slack in the shortage of corn.

Mr. PACE. I appreciate the attitude of the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS] has so thoroughly explained all phases of this bill that it would be but trespassing on the part of the committee if I endeavored to repeat what he has said, because I could do nothing more than to reiterate what the gentleman from Minnesota has already announced.

I therefore ask that the bill be read now for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to establish or develop the following naval shore activities by the construction of such temporary or permanent public works as he may consider necessary, including buildings, facilities, accessories, and services, with which shall be included the authority to acquire the necessary land, and to continue or complete the construction of any project heretofore authorized or undertaken, which projects have been specifically approved by the Secretary of the Navy, with approximate costs as indicated: Fleet facilities, $67,900,000; aviation facilities, $238,000,000; storage facilities, $5,350,000; liquid-fuel storage, $10,350,000; Marine Corps training facilities, $33,132,000; ordnance storage facilities, $50,000,000; personnel training and housing facilities, $33,700,000; hospital facilities, $66,005,000; shore radio facilities, $3,500,000; Naval Research Laboratory, $750,000; miscellaneous structures, $33,000,000; passive defense, $15,000,000; advance bases, $720,000,000; miscellaneous and unforeseen facilities, $223,313,000: Provided, That the approximate cost indicated for each of the classes of projects enumerated above may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, be varied upward or downward but the total cost shall not exceed $1,500,000,000.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, lines 9 and 10, strike out the following: "; miscellaneous and unforeseen facilities $223,313,000."

Page 2, strike out line 14 and substitute therefor the following: "$1,256,607,000: Provided further, That prior to the acquisition, by lease or otherwise, of any land under authority of this act, the Secretary of the Navy shall report to the Senate and House Naval Affairs Committees all such prospective acquisitions."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Thereupon the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MERRITT, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1692) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with the construction of certain public works, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 123, he reported the same back to the House with sundry amendments adopted in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 373, nay 0, not voting 61, as follows:

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RUSSELL]?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I have hesitated to speak on this measure because so many Members have also desired to speak, and I have been afraid that we might be found guilty of an act sometimes called speaking a bill to death. But my interest in the successful prosecution of the terrible war we are engaged in, together with the welfare of those who labor in all the various phases connected with this great undertaking, compels me to say something in behalf of the bill we are now considering.

This measure, in my opinion, comes before this body for consideration at a late hour. There is a crisis to be overcome in all the channels of food production. Food is vitally essential to the successful prosecution of this war, to the maintenance of civilian efficiency; food is scarce and steadily becoming scarcer, and the crop year is well under way already. Everybody seems to agree that more food must be produced, seemingly not realizing that in order to produce more food there must be either more farmers, more land in cultivation, or more efficient production methods. We all know there are many, many farmers in the armed forces today, decreasing instead of increasing this avenue of relief for the situation. Drastic reductions in farm-equipment outputs eliminate the possibility of securing more efficient production methods, and farmers are as always working 12 and 15 hours a day, so there is no available avenue of relief here. There is only one possible way we have today to alleviate, in a small measure, the impending shortage of food, necessary, as we all agree, to the maintenance of civilian efficiency, and to the actual winning of this war; and this way is to increase the acreage planted in foods of all kinds. A very pertinent section of the bill before you today seeks to increase this acreage to some extent; to help supply in some measure, at a very late hour, more food for victory.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] made a timely speech in behalf of this bill. His remarks, logically and powerfully stressing the necessity for Government action to help avert more serious consequences resulting from this situation, should have compelled quick support of this measure. A dire need exists at this time for vegetable oils, more and more vegetable oils, which are used in the manufacture of high explosives. As those of us familiar with this particular commodity know, there will not be more of such oils produced this year. Instead, there will be less oils produced this year, unless encouragement for the production of this commodity is given the farmer. I say the farmer is entitled to produce more. The armed forces of America, the needs of our allies across the seas, and the needs of our people at home demand this.

This bill does not provide a subsidy for the peanut farmer. It only guarantees him 85 percent of parity. Is not this a meager price to pay for a definite aid to the perilous shortage of food which you know so well exists? Much greater prices are paid hourly for much less actual benefit to the war program. This action is necessary to overcome a ceiling placed on vegetable oils. If this price ceiling is not overcome, the peanut farmer will not be able to produce any peanuts for oil purposes, and he will not do so. It would be poor lack of interest in relief of the food shortage and an ungracious act on the part of the Government to ask him to do so, to produce at a loss.

Farming is the basic industry of this country, and at this late hour some are coming to realize the farmer's part in military, as well as civilian, aspects of winning the war. Let us be fair with him today. Let us grant him the opportunity which he must have to produce more food, which the military and civilian needs of today demand. The clarion cry is for food and more food—produce, produce, produce. And yet some seem to think this can be done and will be done simply because more food is needed, regardless of the production stumbling blocks facing the farmer, and regardless of the loss he faces under the present arrangement. Unless this Congress comes to the farmer's aid and gives him a partially fair treatment, I tell you more food cannot and will not be produced. This square deal is all he has ever asked for; it is all he will ever ask for. This bill is a beginning, and should be passed without a dissenting vote.

The American farmer is and has always been patriotic to the core. He has given his sons in large numbers to the Army by way of voluntary service and selective-service induction. Many of these farm boys have also gone into defense plants over the country, because of the extremely high wages being paid there until the agricultural industry is stripped to the bottom for help to produce the necessary food; and unless our Government and this Congress do something that will be a relief to this industry, I am fearful of the results 10 months from now. In this bill we have an opportunity to aid a part of the people who are engaged in farming. It may not be sufficient, and may have to be added to, but it is a beginning. It will not give the farmer cost of production and over 20 cents an hour for his labor, and it will be recalled that he works, not 8 hours a day or 48 hours a week, but from early morn until late at night, with no thought of a 40- or 48-hour week, or time and a half or double time for holidays. He is trying to feed and clothe his family and produce a little extra to help carry on the war effort.

By Executive decree a few days ago a 48-hour week was established, with time and a half for all hours over 40. This meant an inflationary increase of 30 percent on the 48-hour week basis. Do you call this a subsidy? When common labor in industry is drawing 80 cents per hour for their toil? And yet, when this Congress is asked to assist the farmer to get cost of production, and one-fourth as much as common labor is drawing in industry, you hear the cry of "subsidy to the farmer."

The farmer is confronted with the high cost of living the same as any other individual in any other American industry. He is confronted with increased prices for materials, machinery, and commodities which he has to buy. Do you not think it right to, in a small measure, pay him a small percentage and extend to him a part of that American phrase and way of life, equal rights? This bill is a beginning toward doing so.

SELECTIVE SERVICE SYSTEM

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Speaker, I take this time that I may have an opportunity to explain to the House the provisions of my bill, H. R. 1730, to amend the Selective Service Act.

A number of officials who have seen fit to oppose this bill have issued statements with reference to its provisions which are very misleading. I feel, therefore, that I should inform the House of its exact provisions, what it will do and what it will not do.

The bill has for its purpose the formulation of categories of those persons who are registered under the Selective Service Act and have persons dependent upon them. It would formulate four categories. The first would be the single man with no dependents, the second the single man with collateral dependents, such as a mother or other dependent, the third would be the married man with no children, and the fourth the married man with children.

The bill would accomplish three purposes and none other. It would, first of all, provide that quotas be filled on a State-wide basis rather than on a local board basis as at present. Second, it would provide by law for these categories. Third, it would prevent the calling of any man placed in a category with a lower priority ahead of men in a higher priority within his State.

The provision that quotas be filled by local boards has created the greatest dissatisfaction that has arisen under the draft act. It has resulted in a situation in which various draft boards in the cities would be calling their men on entirely different bases with reference to dependents. In other words, it might be that a draft board on one side of the street would be calling married men, or maybe married men with children, while the draft board across the street would still have single men uncalled. It has resulted in the principal dissatisfaction which has existed with reference to the law.

That dependency shall be considered in all questions of deferment is the established policy of this Nation. It has been thoroughly established in the draft laws of two wars. It is the clearly expressed legislative intent that dependency shall be considered in passing upon any question of deferment.

At the time we had the original bill up in 1940, as those of us who served on the Committee on Military Affairs then and have served continuously since remember full well, it was presented to us upon the proposition that dependency constituted the proper basis of determining deferment in all cases of men with dependents. That such a well-established policy of this Government and such a clearly expressed legislative intent should be violated by administrative decree is contrary to our system of government.

Those of us who have worked with this bill from the beginning were very much shocked, indeed, when Mr. Paul V. McNutt announced that as to 29 occupations which, in his opinion, are unessential to the war effort dependency would be disregarded. Such a ruling is contrary to the entire philosophy of selective service. It is wrong in principle, of course. It perverts the Selective Service Act from the high purpose for which it was adopted; that is, the production of fighting men for this Nation, into a whip in the hand of an administrative official, a bureaucrat, if you please, for the enforcement of his administrative orders. That such should ever happen was never the intention of this Congress.

In June 1942, after the declaration of war, we passed a bill—it came through the House as title II of the allotment and allowance bill—under which we provided that the President should have the power to set up categories of registrants with reference to persons dependent upon them.

Immediately after that was passed, actually before it was signed by the President, the Selective Service System issued a regulation to the local boards under which the identical categories which I now have in my bill were set up, and the boards were instructed to defer men with dependents on the basis of those categories.

When the 18- and 19-year-old draft bill was in the committee, I had an amendment attached to the bill which would have required the calling of those categories in the order of priority in which they were then set up.

It was in the bill when it went through the House. There was practically no objection to it. When it passed this House it was thoroughly discussed, and it was fairly understood by the House. However, it went out of the bill in conference, so that it was not in the bill at the time it became law. It was because of its elimination that Mr. McNutt was in a position to issue his order regarding dependency in those 29 instances. Oh, it is true that the occupation included gamblers, bartenders, night club operators, and also some other occupations. The very nature of the occupations which he provided should not be regarded as essential leads me to suspect that those were included for the purpose of opening up the policy that dependency would not constitute a ground for deferment. I fear it was the thought that no one could criticize an order with reference to gamblers, bartenders, and night-club operators, and that then the policy would be established, and it would be in Mr. McNutt's hands to determine just who in this Nation should be deprived of the right of dependency.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. Yes.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman will remember, of course, that at the time the categories, which are the same as in this bill, were written into the Pay and Allotment Act, that that was done at the request of the Selective Service Bureau, and a conference was called by me as chairman of the committee, and some of the ranking members, to discuss it with them before it was written into the bill.

Mr. KILDAY. That is correct. It was adopted at the direct request of the Selective Service. They came before the committee, and it was the one time that we adopted the procedure under which the committee went back into session and heard witnesses on the adoption of a conference report.

Mr. ELSTON of Ohio. The gentleman will recall that Mr. McNutt listed the 29 occupations and asserted that the 29 industries and 36 occupations—that that was only the beginning.

Mr. KILDAY. That is correct, and since that time he has made a further statement to the effect that there would be others to follow in which they would determine for themselves with reference to the essential character of an occupation. The thing to remember here is that there is a matter of principle involved. That there is a matter of principle with reference to the preservation of the families of the Nation. Also that every man in this Nation shall be treated exactly the same, and the wife and child of a man shall be treated exactly the same, and that the matter of dependency shall be passed on as it relates to a particular case.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. What time does the gentleman's bill fix, or does it fix the time in respect to when they marry and have children?

Mr. KILDAY. The provision of my bill is the same as the present regulation of the Selective Service. That is the marriage must have been contracted prior to the 8th of December 1941, which is the present regulation of the Selective Service System. Mr. Speaker, the opposition to this bill proceeded in a very unusual manner. The departments affected have been requested by the Military Affairs Committee to appear and express their views. Many of the things which have been brought up in opposition to the bill were not brought before your committee, and we were sitting as your committee for the purpose of hearing facts. Many of them were given out in newspaper statements or in radio talks, so that there was no opportunity for those who are familiar with the technical phases of this very technical law, the Selective Service Act, to cross-examine or determine whether or not those statements and conclusions were correct. In the first place, there was given to the public the view that should this bill be adopted, occupational deferments would be abolished. It was then said that if it came to a question between the chief of an airplane manufacturing crew, and the father of a family, that the father of the family should go first. I have no quarrel with that. That is not involved in my bill. There never has been a suggestion but that such should be the case. It was one of those things to fill the minds of people with doubt as to what should be done.

I hold in my hand H. R. 1730, and after the enacting clause, the very first paragraph is word for word, verbatim, the present law under which all occupational deferments are now granted. The first paragraph of my bill is a reenactment of the only law under which occupational deferments are now granted. So that from the beginning there has never been any opportunity for any bickering as to whether occupational deferments would be abolished under my bill. When the question was raised, I said if there was any doubt, that I would offer an amendment to make that doubly clear. Before the bill was reported by the Military Affairs Committee, it adopted an amendment to the next paragraph to make clear that registrants shall be assigned in these categories only after all occupational deferments have been granted. In other words, then, your occupational deferments are granted and if the registrant is not granted occupational deferment he is considered for assignment to categories with reference to persons dependent upon him. Only those who are left after occupational deferments are granted are assigned to the categories.

I have not taken the trouble to look it up in the dictionary, but my personal idea is that the words "classification" and "category" are practically the same; that the definitions would be almost identical; but that is not true when you come to the Selective Service Act, because by legislation we have assigned to those two words very fixed and definite legal meaning.

Your classifications are 1–A, single man with no dependents. Then you have classification 2–A, which is a necessary worker in a munitions factory. Then you have 2–B, necessary worker in a related occupation—farming and what not. Then you have 3–A, a married man or a man with dependents; 3–B, a married man or a man with dependents, who is working in a defense industry. Then you come to classification No. 4, which includes those physically, mentally, and morally disqualified for military service.

Those classifications and categories relate only to classification No. 3. They are subheads of classification No. 3.

In my bill I set out those categories. I think it would be well to get my bill and read it. As I offered it, it consisted of 77 lines of printing. Of those I wrote 16. The remainder of the bill consists of the existing provisions of the Selective Service Act and regulations adopted by the Selective Service System itself. So

I assure you there is no pride of authorship on my part here, because of the 77 lines of type, but 16 of them were written by me.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is a fact, is it not, that after the Selective Service System sent out that telegraphic advice to the draft boards they later on withdrew it?

Mr. KILDAY. That is correct for all practical purposes. A telegram was sent out establishing the categories, and it was followed by a letter of confirmation. On the 20th day of June 1942 the telegram went out. On the 26th it was followed by a letter of confirmation, and on the 15th day of July they were abolished, for all practical purposes, in that the new release to local draft boards, instead of saying "You shall do this," said, "You should consider the advisability of assigning them to these categories."

Mr. CASE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield.

Mr. CASE. Does the gentleman's bill do anything about the practice of the United States Employment Commission in recommending the deferment of individuals who are asked for under union contracts and whom the union is unwilling to have released from their jobs?

Mr. KILDAY. May I say to the gentleman my bill does not affect deferments. The point I am trying to make clear is that it has no effect at all on deferments. That is an entirely different question and one to be treated separately. It relates only to the categories of classification No. 3.

Mr. CASE. It does relate to orders that are issued by Mr. McNutt?

Mr. KILDAY. It prevents such orders as he has already issued, effective as of April 1. It prevents them by putting in these categories of dependents, and specifically also prevents them by providing that no man shall be inducted because of his occupation or occupational group. That is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ELSTON].

Mr. CASE. The reason I bring up this question is because of a specific case that came to my attention where a young man was employed in a war industry. The United States Employment Service was ready to replace him and had a man to replace him, but under the union contract he could not be replaced unless he was replaced by union officials, and since they were not ready to replace him, it operated to require deferment.

Mr. KILDAY. May I say I am going to discuss matters like that a little later in detail, because I contend that before disrupting the families of this Nation, the Manpower Commission should have done something about the wastage of manpower such as you mentioned.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield.

Mr. MAY. I wonder if the gentleman has had any information with respect to the activities of the draft boards in local communities since the statement by Mr. McNutt with regard to the continued practice of inducting married men with dependents, indiscriminately, just as they had before.

Mr. KILDAY. I may say that I am very much alarmed relative to the present mental condition of the local draft boards. We will never be able to fully repay the men who have served in the machinery of the Selective Service Act. They have served without compensation. They have served in very difficult tasks, tasks that are thankless. All they get is the satisfaction of having done a patriotic duty. I believe I have heard from more draft board members in the last few weeks than General Hershey or Mr. McNutt. I say to you I am thoroughly alarmed at the way they feel now. They are in personal contact with family men who must go into the service. That responsibility weighs heavily on them.

They have seen what happens to the family after the father has gone and they now are faced with a positive directive that no matter how many children this man may have, no matter what the situation may be with reference to dependency, that because of the character of the work that he may be doing, even though it be an honorable profession, if Mr. McNutt says that it is not essential to the war, then these draft boards are faced with the necessity of taking the head of the family out of that home; and many of them have told me they do not propose to serve under such circumstances as that.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS. Does the gentleman's bill contain any provision that would tend to relieve the farm labor situation?

Mr. KILDAY. No; we do protect the Tydings amendment by providing that it shall not be altered or affected by this bill.

Mr. JENKINS. No doubt in the consideration of this bill much thought was given to that topic. What has developed? Is there anything that I could take back or send back to my farmers who are very much interested in this proposition as to whether or not there is any relief in sight for them?

Mr. KILDAY. I may say that is the next thing we are going to consider in our committee.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. I have had many complaints from my district along the same line the gentleman has been discussing. Am I correct that this bill has already been reported out of committee?

Mr. KILDAY. That is correct; it is now pending in the House.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. When will it be brought up?

Mr. KILDAY. I cannot tell the gentleman about that; that depends on the Rules Committee. We shall have to get a rule. We expect to appear before the Rules Committee in the very near future. I hope we may appear before them tomorrow.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Is there any way in which we can expedite it a little?

Mr. KILDAY. I am going to have to refuse to yield for awhile until I proceed further with my statement.

We come now to the question of occupational deferments and the number of available men to supply the military needs. Now, there is a thing about the administration of the Selective Service Act that has troubled many of us for quite some period of time, and that is the attempt to use it to engender fear in the men who are registered with these boards in order to force them to get into so-called necessary industry and things of that kind. I know it was never the intention of the author of the bill that it should be used for that purpose, and I am sure it was never the intention of the members of the Military Affairs Committee that that would be the office that it would serve. For over a year we have been told that the draft of family men is imminent. Constantly, constantly, constantly this has been drilled into us—if you do not get into a necessary occupation you face draft, and still the threat is the same, "You face draft in the near future." There are other things the Manpower Commission could have done before it resorted to taking the heads of families and disrupting the homes of this Nation. That is to say, they might have done some of these things: At the time that the order was issued, there had been no statement of any prospective lengthening of the 40-hour week.

Later word went out that the 40-hour week had been suspended. I say that that report was misleading—that is the most charitable word I can use—that it was misleading in all of its implications. That order did not suspend the 40-hour week; it provided in almost this language: That no employer shall be regarded as fulfilling his full effort in the war if he is maintaining a workweek of less than 48 hours. They did not go on to say that no employee shall be regarded as doing his full duty in the war effort if he maintains a workweek of less than any number of hours. If he should procure his deferment on the grounds that he was a necessary employee, he could become a chronic absentee, so far as this order is concerned; there is nothing in this order about the 40-hour week that deprives him of his exemption from the draft. He can work 30 hours a week or he can work 15 hours a week, and still there is nothing to affect his status as a necessary man in industry.

Absenteeism, as my colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LYNDON B. JOHNSON] told us here the other day, constitutes our greatest drawback in war production today. The distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] stated that 12,700,000 man-hours of labor were lost in the month of December 1942 alone because of absenteeism. He stated further that only 170,000 man-hours of labor were lost in the entire year 1942 by strikes. Let that sink in!

Now, Mr. Speaker, here is the Manpower Commission, which is charged by law with utilizing the available manpower of this Nation, but it does nothing to correct such absenteeism, but states that it is going to take these fathers of families without doing a thing in the world to correct that situation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Before putting my question, let me say that I am in entire sympathy with the observations the gentleman has just made.

Mr. KILDAY. I thank the gentleman from New York for that statement, for I know of no higher compliment that could be paid my efforts than to have them approved by the distinguished author of the Selective Service Act.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman used an expression, however, the accuracy of which I rather doubt; that is, to the effect that the War Manpower Commission is charged by law to do certain things. I cannot find the law.

Mr. KILDAY. If I said that, I apologize most abjectly. Actually, the thing I am complaining about is that it does not exist by law; as a matter of fact, it exists by Executive order only. I appreciate the gentleman's correction, for I surely would not want to appear so ignorant in the permanent RECORD of the Congress.

We upset the entire educational system of this Nation in the month of November 1942, in order to provide a pool of 1,000,000 eighteen- and nineteen-year-old boys. We never expected to get more than 500,000 soldiers out of that million. The report of the Bellamy committee published on Sunday shows that the Federal Government has over 1,000,000 civilian employees on its pay roll between the ages of 18 and 38. There is a comparable pool to the one that we secured in the 18- and 19-year-old draft. Nothing has been done to see to it that only those essential to the Federal Government should be continued on that pay roll. Had we secured from that pool of a million on a ratio comparable to the 18 and 19 pool, we would save 500,000 homes under the projected program of the Manpower Commission. That is too much to expect. Let us say it is half. Then it would be a quarter of a million homes. Say that is too much. We will take just 10 percent of the million. A hundred thousand homes in this country saved from disruption which now faces them under the order of Paul V. McNutt.

Here is perhaps the most glaring fault of all. On the 5th day of December 1942, the President issued an Executive order stopping voluntary enlistments. He provided then, of course, that all men coming into the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps must come through the Selective Service System. As of December 5 the Army had physical standards which it regarded as proper for an excellent soldier. No one had compelled them to fix those standards. Those were standards that military men regarded as requisite for a soldier on general service in the field. The Navy's qualifications at that time were a good deal higher than the Army's. The Navy has always taken the position that its physical requirements must be higher. They contend that their men must have perfect vision and there were some other so-called defects which the Army overlooked but the Navy would not. So that when the Army was put to drawing its men from the same pool as the Navy, notwithstanding that its physical requirements were sufficient to itself, it saw fit to raise its physical requirements to meet those of the Navy. Very shortly before Mr. McNutt said, "We will take family men" the Army increased its physical requirements, thereby very materially increasing the percentage of those rejected for physical reasons If there is a Manpower Commission should it not have the power to see to it that the Army, if its physical requirements were sufficient, would not increase them simply because the Navy had higher requirements, or if the Navy's were too high that they would be required to reduce them to the level of the Army? On the other hand, if each was necessary that they would require them to retain them as they were and save these hundreds of thousands of men, single men, men without dependents, available for military duty, qualified physically before December 5, 1942, and now disqualified because of higher physical standards. This is a great waste of manpower.

A cruel thing was done in the opposition of this bill and I hope it was not done intentionally. A contention was made that if my bill were adopted it would mean that the venereals and other undesirables throughout the country would have to be taken into the service first.

I say that was a cruel thing sent out to the homes of prospective draftees. It was a cruel thing to have the mothers and fathers of this Nation believe that we were going to organize our Army basically with venereals, then we were going to fill it up with boys from good Christian homes in this Nation to be soldiering side by side with all the venereals in the country. Still that statement was made and it was given publicity throughout the Nation. Of course, the witness who testified to that before the committee, on cross-examination by me, admitted that that probably was not the situation, but as it is with charges of that sort, the qualification or the explanation never catches up with the charge.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague's time be extended for another 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMASON]?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMASON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. THOMASON. I think the gentleman from Texas has contributed much to the war effort by the introduction of his bill and also by having it reported to the House where there can be full and fair discussion of the whole selective-service administration. May I say that on the whole the selective-service administration, and particularly the local boards, as suggested by my colleague, have done a marvelous job. However, I would like for the gentleman to comment on two things that were testified to before the committee by General Hershey, head of the Selective Service, and also by General White, Chief of Personnel in the War Department. One of these was that in their judgment this bill is impractical, if not impossible, of administration. The other one, in order that my colleague may comment on it for the information of the House, is that most of those gentlemen testified, as I recall it, that due to the seriousness of the war effort it is now apparent that by the first of next year all men under 38 years of age who are physically fit, whether married or unmarried, will be called into the service. In the event that is true, and we must rely upon that assumption, I am anxious for my colleague to comment on what his bill would then accomplish.

Mr. KILDAY. I may say to the gentleman that that is my next topic for discussion. I want to finish my statement now with reference to the contention that it would require the calling in of the undesirables first.

There are three distinct reasons why that could not happen. In the first place, these men would be assigned to categories under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe. In the second place, the definition of each category is preceded by the language:

> Registrant otherwise qualified.

Nowhere is the qualification defined in the statute, and it is still within the power of the President and the Selective Service to state what shall constitute "qualified." They can make it what they please. The third reason is this: There now appears in the law—and I rewrite it into my bill as the second paragraph beginning on page 3—this language:

> The President is authorized under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe to provide for the deferment from training and service under this act in the land and naval forces of the United States of any and all categories of those men found to be physically, mentally, or morally deficient or defective.

So that situation never did exist. There was never any possibility of such results. Now I want to comment on my colleague's points in reverse order.

In the first place, I do not recall that any definite date was stated by which all men under 38 physically qualified would have to be in the Service, but I accept my colleague's statement of the first of the year. I do not care if the delay is only 30 minutes, I say that the family relationship in this Nation should be recognized and protected to the last second possible. I do not care whether it is pending for every married man in the Nation to go, and when we need them, of course, they will go and my bill does not prevent it. It provides that they shall all be taken, but they shall be taken in this order of preference, recognizing the family as being the cornerstone of our society and our Nation, recognizing it as being the institution we are seeking to preserve in this war. I say that it is worth while to preserve it, if it is only for a few minutes or a few weeks or a few months.

I cannot get over the fact that more than a year ago the same statements were going forth that the induction of married men with children was imminent; exactly the same statements as are going forth now went forth back there at that time.

Right here let me give you some figures by comparison with the World War which show that there is some difficulty here, something is out of kilter. At the time the World War ended we had 4,800,000 men under arms in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard. We had approximately that same number of men under arms at the time we considered the 18- and 19-year-old draft. At the end of the World War not more than 12 percent of the men who served were married. This included those who married while in service. These figures are secured from the allotment and allowance records of the World War.

We drafted men from 21 to 31 in the World War, except that 120,000 some odd under 21 and over 31 were inducted under the provisions of the last draft act. We had a larger age spread in this war because we were at that time drafting the age group from 21 to 45.

We have 20,000,000 more people in the country now than we had during the last war, and still when we reached the same point in the size of our Army we were told that we were faced with the imminent draft of family men, when we did not reach that point in the World War with 20,000,000 less people in the country.

You may say, too, there is so much more industry now, but that does not account for it. Less than 1,200,000 in the entire Nation were in II–A and II–B, about five-hundred-thousand-and-some-odd in munitions factories, and almost the same number in related industries, including the farm, at the time we reduced the draft age. So that is not where your situation is. There is a leakage in your manpower, that is true. I still contend, and have contended from the beginning with little success, that it comes from that provision of the law under which the quota of the local board is based not upon the number who are registered in that local board but upon the number registered in that local board and not deferred by it.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. THOMASON. I think it should be pointed out that whereas in the last war, as the gentleman says, there were 4,800,000 men in the service, there are already approximately 7,500,000 men in the service, and we are rapidly on the way to having 10,000,000 or 11,000,000 men in the service.

Mr. KILDAY. If my colleague will recall, I said that at the time we considered the 18-and-19-year-old amendment to the Draft Act our armed forces were practically identical with those of the World War, and we were then reducing our minimum to 18-year-olds, and long before that the contention had been made that the draft of family men was imminent.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. On the question of this bill's not being susceptible of proper administration, let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that under the bill there is nothing that will prevent married men from being inducted, even married men with a number of children, when the time comes that it is necessary to do it.

Mr. KILDAY. That is correct. The last question General Hershey answered before the committee as he left the stand was my question:

> Now, General, isn't it a fact that under my bill no person not now deferred would be deferred by my bill?

He said:

> That is correct. It creates no new deferment.

Mr. THOMASON. In that connection, may I ask another question? Under the gentleman's bill would an unmarried young man engaged, say, in a necessary agricultural pursuit, who is necessary on a farm, be drafted before a married man with a rich wife or a wife who had an income?

Mr. KILDAY. Under no circumstances, as I told the gentleman in the committee.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RUSSELL. Is there now or has there been any provision to defer a young man because he is engaged in the agricultural industry? If there is, I have failed to find it or hear of it.

Mr. KILDAY. When the 18–19-year-old draft bill was up, Senator TYDINGS in the Senate offered an amendment to the bill which provided for the continuance of a man in agriculture, and that he should lose his deferred status if he left without the permission of his draft board. But there has never been the possibility that my colleague from Texas [Mr. THOMASON] raises here, of taking a single man in a necessary industry in order to grant deferment to a married man with a rich wife or who is able to take care of his children from his estate or anything of that kind. That question has never been involved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 10 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. Yes.

Mr. THOMASON. I am not taking issue with the gentleman by controverting his answer to my question, but what provision in the bill does the gentleman make that answer to, when you say that an unmarried young man on a farm and necessarily engaged in farming will not be taken before a married man with a rich wife?

Mr. KILDAY. I am going to read the provision of the bill to my colleague. I shall read the paragraph, for it contains only a few lines.

Mr. THOMASON. We are all interested in this, and I think it is a very important matter to be cleared up.

Mr. KILDAY. This is a very helpful discussion. After the enacting clause the bill is amended to read as follows:

> (1) The President is authorized, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to provide for the deferment from training and service under this act in the land and naval forces of the United States of any or all categories of those men whose employment in industry, agriculture, or other occupations or employment, or whose activity in other endeavors is found in accordance with section 10 (a) (2) to be necessary to the maintenance of the national health, safety, or interest.

Then comes the next paragraph:

> Under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe, registrants not deferred under the foregoing paragraph shall be assigned to categories with respect to persons dependent upon them for support, in the following order.

The only power that now exists for deferring men in industry or agriculture exists under present law which is this first paragraph of my bill. If this language was not in the present law, they could not grant occupational deferments. I have put in the same identical language, and under an abundance of precaution have provided the categories shall be formulated of what is left after the occupational deferments have been made.

Mr. THOMASON. I take no issue with what the gentleman is saying, but there are subsequent provisions in the gentleman's bill, which he so ably expounded in the beginning, in which you say that every single man in the State, not in the area of the local board, must be exhausted before you can take a married man under any conditions.

Mr. KILDAY. Let me interpret that. The registrants will not go into the categories until after the occupational deferments have been granted. The provisions to which the gentleman refers read as follows—and this is the only section of the bill that I wrote, and the rest of it is either existing law or a regulation written by Selective Service:

> Persons assigned to such categories shall be inducted in the foregoing order of such categories. No person assigned to any of said categories shall be called for induction prior to the call for induction of all persons within the same State who have been placed in categories herein made subject to induction prior to the category in which such person has been placed.

Therefore the category with the lower priority cannot be inducted prior to the induction of all persons in the State who have been assigned to categories with a higher priority. But it relates only to those "who have been" placed in such categories and no person is placed in a category until all occupational deferments have been granted. Then those left over are assigned to the categories.

Now, let us discuss whether the bill is capable of administration. We must remember that 4 months before the time scheduled for induction the calls are made upon the States. Therefore, 4 months before the men are desired the National Selective Service sends to each of the 48 States, and to the District of Columbia, a call for a blanket number of men from that particular territory. It goes to the State director. In his office the State director allocates that call among the local boards in his State.

The State director maintains in his office at all times a current inventory of the men available in each of the local boards in his State. He knows the number of single men in each board in his State. He knows the number of single men with collateral dependents; the number of married men with no children; the number of married men with children. He is also from time to time given the number for which that State is entitled to credit for volunteers and those already in the service. The State director, in his office in the State capital, takes that blanket call and apportions it to his local boards, giving each local board credit for those who are already in the service. If my bill is adopted the only difference would be that where there was a local board that had no single men and there were local boards with single men in the State, he would make no call on the board which had exhausted its single men until he had exhausted the single men in other boards. The same would be true if he had a call for 2,000 men and he filled it with 1,000 single men, and that is all he had left in the State, then he would take the other 1,000 married men without children and apportion them out in those boards from the current inventory he keeps in his office at the State capital. There could be no difficulty at all in its administration.

Mr ELSTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield.

Mr. ELSTON of Ohio. Can the gentleman conceive of anything that would add more to the difficulties of administration of the Selective Service Act than an attempt to enforce Mr. McNutt's order?

Mr. KILDAY. I cannot imagine anything as destructive of the morale of our people. There is not a business in any town or in any city in the United States that is not now completely disrupted. I wish you could come to my office and read some of the hundreds and hundreds of letters that I have, some from ministers in those communities, appealing to the Congress to do something to extricate families living in their parishes from the horrible cruelty that has been brought to bear upon them by this kind of an order. Letters come from mothers of children who are not able to work. They are to be faced with this difficulty, notwithstanding the plain mandate of the Congress that it shall not be done.

There is nothing in the world about my bill that is not workable. They all have to admit, when you pin them down to it, that it is workable. When they come before the Military Affairs Committee they know that we are informed of the technical workings of this act and that a simple, blank statement by them that it cannot work will not suffice. There has been only one reason advanced why it should not be adopted, and that is "Because I do not want it." The only reason that has been advanced by any of the departments after you take into consideration the cross-examination of the witnesses is, "I do not want it." We know that the Manpower Commission does not want to face organized opposition to a National Service Act. They would like to convert the machinery of the Selective Service Act to that purpose. It may be much easier for them to do. I say to you if we are worthy of the positions of trust which we hold, it is time for us to say the legislative intent is plain. We have spoken time and again upon what the policy of this Nation shall be, and we insist and we maintain that the families shall not be thus so easily disrupted. I am willing to maintain the 40-hour week in peacetime. I am willing to maintain it as an institution, but before we go into the maintenance of that, let us see to it that that great institution in American life, the Christian American family, be maintained.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JACKSON] is recognized for 15 minutes.

INVESTIGATION OF THE JAPANESE IN AMERICA

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a resolution, asking that a special committee of the House be set up to investigate Japanese activities in the United States and its possessions. I have requested that this committee direct an investigation into any and all activities of the Japanese in the United States, its Territories, and possessions, including their infiltration into American economic, political, and social life, with the end of preserving the security of the United States during the war and looking toward the establishment of a proper policy toward the Japanese residents of the United States, its Territories and possessions after the war.

We first heard much of Japanese infiltration tactics on Bataan and in the Philippines, but the Japanese had for many years practiced a different type of infiltration—infiltration into the vitals of our economic, political, and domestic structure. The disciples of Bushido, by insidious and indirect means, inserted themselves in a great many organizations in much the same fashion as the Nazis have utilized their front organizations. In our great Pacific coast cities they controlled much of the hotel and restaurant business although always there was a white manager who would front for them with the general public. They lowered prices to their own countrymen in the fresh produce and vegetable field, forcing out their white competition, only to raise prices as soon as they had monopolized this sphere of business. Always they had prominent civic leaders as their attorneys, paying them on a retainer basis. Whenever a situation came up in which they were interested, they had only to contact these individuals with their specious reasons to have them immediately come forward in their interest. Investigation will show that Japanese consuls in our large cities lavished expensive and sumptuous gifts on a great number of prominent citizens at Christmas and other appropriate occasions.

I wish to make it clear here that I do not intend to indict the great majority of these individuals because I am positive there was no disloyalty to their country in their minds. However, because their actions were unintentional, does not alter the fact that they were of great importance and value in the subtle propagandizing efforts of the Japanese nation and enabled them to exert an unbelievable amount of influence on the economic, political, and social life of the Pacific coast region.

After my study of this question, I wish to assure the Members of this House that there is not the slightest doubt in my mind but that the Japanese consul, taking his orders directly from Tokyo, ruled the Japanese colonies in our country with an iron and dictatorial hand; thus there was a society within a society and a race within a race. Every 2 years the Japanese consul in the large Pacific coast cities was changed and a new consul came in, bearing direct orders from the "Son of Heaven" in Tokyo. He directed the establishment of Japanese language schools; he managed the complicated Japanese financial system through the Japanese banks, owned and controlled in the land of the Samurai. The consulate office was the fountainhead from which flowed all directives to Japanese residents, both alien and native to this country, and was also the center of espionage and propaganda activity to which came all the data which the Japanese were able to gather regarding our Pacific coast line and the isles and inlets of the Alaskan Peninsula.

Let me outline briefly to you a few of the examples of Japanese infiltration tactics which have recently come to light. The most striking example, in my opinion, is a fact recently brought out by Miller Freeman, captain, U. S. N. R., retired, publisher of eight trade journals, and who is undoubtedly one of the greatest experts on the Japanese problem in our country. He points out that in the China Club of Seattle, Wash., which has an executive board composed of 29 members, 11 members are listed in the 1942 roster of officers and members of the Japan Society of Seattle. How ironic it is that with China and Japan having been at war for over 5 years such a large majority of the directors of the China Club and the Japan Club should belong to both organizations.

I wonder also if you gentlemen know that immediately after Pearl Harbor, several Japanese organizations turned over to the American Red Cross a number of bandages, medical supplies, and other material fashioned by Japanese societies. They attempted to obtain wide publicity and made great fanfare about their patriotism at that time, neglecting, however, to mention that all their supplies up to that date had been forwarded to the Japanese military machine. They neglected, also, to mention that it was necessary for them to remove the bills of lading from the material which they donated to our Government because it had been addressed previously to Tokyo.

The War Relocation Authority and the Federal Reserve Bank Board now have all the information regarding the financial assets and economic enterprises of the Japanese in this country. Now that we are at war with Japan, we need not be concerned with diplomatic niceties. Is there any reason why this information should not be made available to the American people? Do not the American people, and particularly the residents of the Pacific coast, have the right to know the extent of the economic stranglehold possessed by Japanese residents on the domestic economy of our country? I for one must insist that the American people have a right to be fully informed on this subject.

Let me point out also here that these are not recent developments in Japanese strategy. The Japanese have used these tactics for many years. Over 20 years ago, our able colleague [Mr. WOODRUFF] called to the attention of Congress some information which he has recently again brought to light before this Seventy-eighth Congress. During World War No. 1, our so-called ally, Japan, owned two airplane plants in the State of New Jersey which were employed on Government contracts. These two plants were the Standard Aircraft Corporation and the Standard Aero Co., which were in the control of Mitsui & Co., the fiscal agents of the Japanese Government at that time. Japan, therefore, had access to our most advanced secret military information regarding that vital military weapon, the airplane. Under orders from Tokyo, this company actually shipped a number of complete airplane engines to Japan for study and imitation at the height of this war. It has even been reliably reported that Jap emissaries applied at that time to Thomas Edison, head of the United States War Invention Board, to share in all the technical military information available to this country.

Despite the enlightening exposé made by the gentleman from Michigan, Congressman WOODRUFF, and despite the fact further investigation showed the Japanese had not only stolen our military secrets but while so doing had milked the United States Treasury of over $16,000,000, I can find no evidence to demonstrate that any successful effort was ever made to follow up these events and to receive an accounting from the Japanese nation.

Those who have read the White Paper of the State Department, outlining our Nation's course of diplomacy with Japan prior to Pearl Harbor, find it difficult to understand why the American people were left so much in the dark as to the actual trend of diplomatic events in that area. I venture to say that if the true facts are brought out regarding the inadequacy of our naval intelligence in the Pacific area the American public will find such a revelation even more astounding. I know conclusively that the facts regarding Japanese military preparations, the Japanese war psychosis, and Japanese plans for conquest were brought forcefully to the attention of our Naval Intelligence not once but many times in the years preceding Pearl Harbor.

Even the schoolboys in coastal cities on the Pacific coast who had observed Japanese merchant marine sailors, cameras slung over their backs, on their Sunday afternoon stroll over the waterfronts of our large cities were more aware of the crisis which might become imminent at any moment.

Certainly, the fishermen in the great Alaskan salmon industry, who had fought to expel Japanese floating canneries from our Alaskan waters, were well aware of the true facts. Certainly, too, it is no wonder that these same fishermen expressed their wonder in times past that not only did the State Department exert its influence against their efforts to expell the Japs from these regions, but even urged that their technical and student missions receive special courtesies in viewing this area. If anyone doubts the accuracy of the information which the Japanese have regarding the shores and inlets of the Alaskan Peninsula, I urge him to ask any experienced fishing skipper in those waters if he would not prefer to have the Japanese maps and sounding charts in preference to those obtained by the belated efforts of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey.

In my mind there is no question but that the same pro-Japanese influences which existed in this country prior to Pearl Harbor still exist, although they have temporarily gone underground. I believe the investigation of Japanese activity during these many years in our country will bring out a number of startling revelations which will materially assist us in the prosecution of the present war. Mme. Chiang Kai-shek quoted a Chinese proverb in her recent address to this House: "Know thyself; know thy enemy." I do not believe that either the American people, the Members of Congress, or even the military authorities can fully understand the Japanese conflict in all its aspects without knowing more fully what has been the history of pre-war infiltration and propagandizing in this country. If we fully study and analyze their mode of second-front activity in this country, we will better be able to conduct the present war to a successful and speedy conclusion. Armed with this information, we will realize the necessity for diverting a greater portion of our military might to the war in the Pacific before they have been able to consolidate the vast industrial and economic empire they have recently taken over.

Even a dilettante student of history knows Japan, although nominally one of our allies in World War No. 1, did practically nothing for the common cause in that conflict. They did manage, however, to take Tsingtao from the Germans, which they afterward retained along with the mandated isles, which they fortified strongly in abrogation of their solemn trust and which we must now reckon with in the war of the Pacific. By building up previous to the First World War a great stock pile of materials which they lacked, they also managed to grab a great part of world trade. In truth, the greatest factor in the modern economic development of Japan was the First World War. Japan felt no obligation to her allies in that war any more than she has given us any reason in World War No. 2 to believe she will assist Germany unless such help coincide with her own nefarious purposes. However, in the event Germany seems about to succumb to weight of combined Allied military might, may we not expect that she will attempt a diversion to save her own skin?

I submit, gentleman, in view of what has already transpired in the past and future eventualities we may anticipate, this investigation is an urgent and immediate necessity.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I compliment the gentleman for bringing this subject to the attention of the House at this time. I think it is high time that we look into the status of the Japanese in this country not only during the war but after the war. Will the gentleman give the House his attitude on the present War Department project of developing a Japanese unit within our own armed services?

Mr. JACKSON. I might say to the gentleman that I have not gone into that matter in any great detail. We all know, however, that it is one which requires the greatest precaution. From what we have been able to gather up to date I think it is pretty clear that the Japanese we trusted most are those who often proved to be the most treacherous.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. Does not the gentleman believe that the utmost care must be taken in separating the wheat from the chaff, so to speak, before any Japanese in this country are permitted to join our armed forces?

Mr. JACKSON. That is right. I do not see how it is possible for the War Relocation Authority or any other branch of the Government to determine the loyalty of the individual Japanese on the basis of the information we now have on hand.

Mr. ANDERSON of California. The gentleman comes from the Pacific coast and knows the reaction of the people out there just as I do.

Mr. JACKSON. That is right.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. The gentleman knows that there are already a number of Japanese in the Army—several thousand who are there under operation of the Selective Service Act prior to our going into war with Japan.

Mr. JACKSON. That is right.

Mr. HINSHAW. They are now in the service.

Mr. JACKSON. That is right.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JACKSON. I yield.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The gentleman, I understand, is proposing a committee to make this investigation; is that correct?

Mr. JACKSON. Yes; I may say that it is for a study of the Japanese problem in all its aspects.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I believe the gentleman is proposing a very good line of inquiry, but I see the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] present, and I wonder if this does not come within the purview of the work of the Dies committee.

Mr. JACKSON. I may say to the gentleman from Tennessee in that connection that what I propose is a study of the whole Japanese question, not just the matter of the subversive side of it with which the gentleman from Texas is interested. The committee that I propose is of much broader scope than that of the Dies committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] is recognized for 15 minutes.

DOMESTIC FOOD REQUIREMENTS

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, about 10 days ago there was published a portion of a report called The Tables and Notes of Estimates of Minimum Civilian Consumer Requirements by the Office of Civilian Supply of the War Production Board. That Office is headed by a man named Joseph Weiner. The report contained a number of statements or a study or recommendation which would bring prohibition back to the United States by the back door.

The Office of Civilian Supply, in this report, stated that the country should have its distilled liquor production—its distilled liquor supply after the present supply shall have been exhausted—reduced to 1 percent. The cut was to be 99 percent—a sort of bedrock recommendation, if the war endured for several years.

I asked to see the full report. We only had the newspaper version of part of the report. I was refused the report by the Office of Civilian Supply under Mr. Weiner. I then wrote to the Stabilization Director, Mr. Byrnes, and said that, insofar as a portion of the report had been made public, the entire report should be made public; that if the press had a portion of the report the Congress was entitled to the entire report. I presume, as a result of my letter to Mr. Byrnes, the entire report has now been made public. It appeared in the New York Times of day before yesterday. It is called Tables and Notes on Estimates of Minimum Civilian Consumer Requirements, supposedly during the extremities and rigors of war. I have gone through these notes and tables and estimates, and, so far as I am concerned, they are naught but arbitrary abstractions and pure guesswork. They are so loosely devised, so conditioned, as to be valueless, but to the uninitiated, to the rank and file of the public who only read headlines, they may be mightily dangerous and frightening. They have already caused runs in various stores throughout the Nation, particularly with reference to liquors, watches, and toilet preparations, among other commodities.

These tables are based upon consumption records of 1941 and in turn based upon 1939 prices and are to be made applicable to 1943, 1944, and 1945 and beyond, depending upon the duration of the war. Any schoolboy knows that 1943 and 1944 and 1945 and on would be utterly different from 1939 and 1941. I repeat, the schedules are based on consumption in 1941, and in turn based upon prices of 1939. The years 1943, 1945, and 1946, and onward, probably are no more the same as the years 1939 and 1941 than the moon is like green cheese. There will be vast differences between those periods. There will be difference in production values and costs, difference in the quantity of materials available, wholesale changes in laws and regulations. The pre-war period will be utterly different from the war years. And because of these changes this whole business, this whole report, to my mind, is absurd, useless, and a mere hodgepodge.

These estimates, furthermore, fail to consider the extreme differences in taxes between the years 1939 and 1941 and the taxes that may have to be imposed in the years 1943, 1945, 1946, and so on, the taxes that may be written in this House for the future. They fail to consider changes in purchasing power, changes in living standards in different parts of the country. They fail to consider the black market and other important factors. I come to the inescapable conclusion that the whole business is a mumbo-jumbo of nonsense and wishful thinking.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Do I understand the gentleman to intend to convey the idea that there is a bigger demand for liquor in 1942 than 1941, and a still greater demand in 1943 and 1944?

Mr. CELLER. No; I did not say that. I will come to the liquor part of it in a moment. I did not infer what the gentleman indicated in any sense of the word.

Mr. REES of Kansas. The gentleman said the estimates for the following years were incorrect.

Mr. CELLER. They do not estimate what the consumption will be in the following years. Their theory is this: They give you a bedrock estimate of what the civilian can do with or without and they take the consumption of 1941 based on 1939 prices, and they apply that to what they consider the most rigorous period of the war, the so-called bedrock consumer-demand period. When that time will come I do not know, and they do not tell us.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Is the gentleman afraid we are going to run out of liquor?

Mr. CELLER. No; that is not my point. If the gentleman will bear with me, he will get my point.

This report cuts radios, for example, down to 12 percent. Just why it is 12 percent we are not told. It is mighty serious, however, to cut down radios when the ears of the Nation are glued to radios for war news. But maybe we will be compelled to cut radios even lower than 12 percent. What I complain about is that we are not told why they must be cut to 12 percent. Books are cut to 29.3 percent at a time when books will be more necessary for the enlightenment of the public than ever before. But why 29.3 percent? On whose authority? On Mr. Weiner's? We can have no confidence in his judgment. Who aided him? What are their records? Who are they? The authors of this report are so guileless as to imagine the public will hold the manufacture of watches down to nil, while lipstick and rouge is reduced to 70 percent. Imagine watches entirely cut out but lipstick held at 70 percent. Citrus fruits are to be 76 percent, toilet soap and deodorants are, respectively, 67 and 70 percent, while tomatoes, a very valuable vegetable, are reduced to 76 percent. Golf balls are 50 percent. Why in thunder we must have golf balls manufactured and golf courses open when we come to the extremes of war is beyond my comprehension. Coal is reduced to 75 percent. Why? We are not told. It is just an arbitrary figure like all the others. It is just as though someone put a lot of numbers in a hat, and someone blindfolded pulled them out.

Over and beyond that, the report still contains the obnoxious recommendation that manufactured whisky and distilled spirits be reduced to 1 percent of the 1941 consumption, based upon 1939 prices. The authors under this man Weiner are as unrealistic as a log of wood, I would say. They offer no reasons for this cut. They do not tell us who was consulted. We must take it or leave it. Here is a ukase. Obey it. Ask no questions. Did the Office of Civilian Supply confer with Army or Navy officials? Did representatives of the Executive vouchsafe any suggestions or memoranda? Who is behind this sorry mess?

The report is encyclopedic in scope as it is revolutionary in purpose. It covers all commodities and services. Yet the Congress was not consulted, the public was not consulted, and industry was not consulted. The author or authors only consulted themselves. I would call them wiseacres and mere pretenders to knowledge. These men fail to realize, for example, that during the last war the Nation refused to accept prohibition, refused to accept a 1-percent regimen. The Nation flouted prohibition. The bootleggers supplied the demand, and they will do so again, but in the meanwhile a billion dollars in revenue will be lost. This Nation will not again be regimented into prohibition—Weiner or no Weiner—Office of Civilian Supply or no Office of Civilian Supply.

Mr. CURTIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. CURTIS. Do I understand that this document or ruling that the gentleman is discussing has already been put into effect or is it a mere proposal?

Mr. CELLER. It is a proposal.

Mr. CURTIS. By what authority does he propose it?

Mr. CELLER. Goodness knows. I do not know. Perhaps the gentleman can give me some enlightening information on it.

Mr. CURTIS. What is his official capacity in this Government?

Mr. CELLER. He is Chairman of the Office of Civilian Supplies.

Mr. CURTIS. He is the same gentleman that cut the agricultural machinery estimates of the Department of Agriculture in half?

Mr. CELLER. I believe he is the same gentleman. I am here to criticize him most severely, and I hope the gentleman who has just propounded the questions will do the same thing.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. This preliminary report was bad enough, but the final report is worse. I am reminded of an old adage that the more you poke an old pile the worse it stinks, and that is the best way I can characterize this report that has emanated from the Office of Civilian Supply as presided over by this man Weiner.

Mr. KEFAUVER Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Does it appear that this is a report from a committee or from this man individually?

Mr. CELLER. It is a report presumably from this so-called Office of Civilian Supply, presided over by this man Joseph P. Weiner.

Mr. KEFAUVER. May I ask the gentleman further if there were any public hearings or if the public had an opportunity of presenting its viewpoint?

Mr. CELLER. I checked on that, and, as far as I could discover, there were no public hearings. The public was not taken into the confidence of these "Weinerites," these charlatans. Congress was not consulted. I do not believe a single Member of the House or the Senate was consulted. I do not know of anybody who was consulted. Industry was not consulted, and they have a very strong interest in the cutting down of their production and their wares. They are as patriotic as these "Weinerites." They ought to know something about it. We ought to know something about it. A report as cataclysmic as is this report certainly ought to be the result of some deliberation on the part of the Members of the House. No; we get it after it is all cooked up, ready to dish out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, before I begin my discussion on the subject for which I asked time to address the House, may I say that I am not so deeply alarmed as the gentleman from New York who just preceded me, with reference to the shortage of liquor in this country. I believe that if the manpower, energy, and materials that are being used in the manufacture, sale, and distribution of liquor, were utilized in industry or business necessary in the prosecution of the war, our country and our people would be so much better off than by using all this material and manpower for such unnecessary purposes. I do not think we need to get so terribly alarmed because someone in a report advocates the cutting down of the use of intoxicating liquors in this critical time. How anyone can justify the use of sugar and other important food ingredients for use in intoxicating liquor is more than I can understand. There appears to be plenty of liquor on hand, but not enough food. Liquor stocks are plentiful, but not food.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CELLER. The gentleman knows there is no distillation of liquor now, that those facilities are all used for the production of alcohol for smokeless powder.

Mr. REES of Kansas. I am informed the liquor people claim they had a 3- or 4-year supply on hand when they went into that production. Nobody has seen fit to ration liquor in this country except in State-wide rationing in a few States. The Federal Government has not done any rationing of liquor, but it has rationed shoes, canned foods, vegetables, and other foods, besides necessary farm machinery, and other necessary things. If you want to go to a liquor store I am informed you can still buy whatever quantity you want without the necessity of coupon books or rationing regulations. At least that is the case here in the District of Columbia, where more liquor is consumed than in any city of its comparative size in this country. They may decide to change the practice, but not so now. The supply seems to be holding out, at least in Washington.

Mr. CELLER. There is considerable rationing at the source of whatever distilled spirits are left. They do not manufacture any liquor now.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, during the past 2 years, I have been trying to secure legislation to amend the Agricultural Act so a farmer could feed his own "excess" wheat to his livestock and poultry without paying a penalty on it, also to permit a farmer to put his green corn in the silo without being included in a corn quota. I have thought the penalty of 49 cents on wheat raised in addition to a restricted quota was too strict, and have tried to secure legislation on that matter. The Department of Agriculture did not see fit to go along, but opposed it. But today, as the House was about to consider and vote on these matters, we are advised the Department by Executive order has, without legislation, agreed that farmers should not be penalized for feeding wheat to livestock and poultry, and they should not be made to pay 50 cents a bushel for extra wheat they might be fortunate to grow in addition to their allotment by the Government. They say now a farmer may raise any amount of wheat he desires, except he is expected to comply with other requirements of the farm program. Of course, I am glad to see the Department go at least as far as it did.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the Department plans to do with all the penalty money that has been collected from the farmers and now in escrow, but I do know these same farmers could and would make good use of that money. Looks kind of off color for the Government to keep that penalty money that was collected because a farmer raised a little extra wheat that is going to be so much needed in the next few months. In 1941 the sum of $5,194,822 was collected in penalties from Kansas farmers. About $2,000,000 has been refunded. Last year the Government collected $763,000 from the farmers of my State; about $40,000 of that has been returned. I do not know about the figures for the whole country, but understand they are about five times these amounts. These farmers who raised the so-called excess wheat did not receive parity payments, or 85-percent loans, or insurance benefits, or even soil-conservation payments. Then why not refund their money? I am informed that except in a few cases most of it is in small amounts, and most of it paid by men engaged in diversified farming. That extra wheat, although we did not realize it, may turn out to be mighty important as a part of our dwindling food supply.

Mr. Speaker, our own Government and the governments of countries in other parts of the world are asking for more and more food. People across the seas are in want at the present hour. As a matter of fact, our so-called surplus of wheat is dwindling right now. I am informed the estimated carry-over for July 1 is about 700,000,000 bushels. I understand, too, that about 75,000,000 bushels of this amount is to be allocated for livestock feed. Possibly a hundred million bushels will go for foreign relief. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, the shortage of other foods is bound to increase the demand for wheat products, so that by July 1 we may not have more than 400,000,000 bushels of wheat. If we should happen to have a rather short crop in place of a surplus this year, we could have a shortage within the year. I think, Mr.

Speaker, that we are going to be mighty fortunate if we do have a little surplus of wheat by the end of the year.

Mr. Speaker, 1 year's crop failure would not only wipe out all our surplus but would create a food crisis. The farm problem and the production of food is becoming more serious day by day. Even if we could be assured of a favorable crop year and could have the employment and equipment similar to last year, we would still be unable to meet the demands for food. Our producers are beginning the year with a shortage of labor and a shortage of farm machinery and equipment, and yet they are expected to produce even more food than last year. Unless, Mr. Speaker, the producers of our country are given a little more help, equipment, and machinery than present plans and regulations appear to permit, the food shortage in this country by the end of 1943 will be the most critical experienced in this country in its history.

Mr. Speaker, the American farmer has a tremendous responsibility. He will do his best to meet it, notwithstanding the handicaps that confront him.

Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with a most critical problem. We must not do anything to hamper or hinder production. On the other hand, we must see to it that everything possible under the circumstances shall be done to help the farmer in his effort to meet the challenge that confronts him.

JUDGE LESLIE R. DARR

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, in the Appendix of the RECORD at page A656, there appears a statement of the gentleman from Tennessee, the Honorable JOHN JENNINGS, Jr., Representative of the Second District of Tennessee. In this statement Judge Leslie R. Darr is severely criticized and castigated for the sentence he imposed upon three defendants who were convicted in the district court at Chattanooga of illegally interfering with an election in McMinn County, Tenn.

Mr. Speaker, the independence, purity, and the honesty of the Federal judiciary is one of the most blessed bedrocks of our democracy. The Federal courts have deserved and won the approbation of the people throughout the history of this Republic. That confidence must be preserved. With all deference to the gentleman from Tennessee, I think it ill becomes any Member of Congress to criticize the action of a Federal judge when he was not present at the trial, did not hear the testimony, and did not see the witnesses as they appeared in court.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. Is it not true that our colleague from Tennessee [Mr. JENNINGS] has spent a number of months working on this case, gathering up the evidence presented to the Department of Justice, and was to a very great extent familiar with the facts in the case, whether or not the gentleman from Tennessee agrees with what he said about the sentence or not?

Mr. KEFAUVER. If the gentleman will give me opportunity to answer his question, I shall endeavor to do so. I have read in the newspapers that the gentleman from Tennessee has been very much interested in the case. I did not observe that he was present at the trial. I might say to the gentleman that I notified the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JENNINGS] that I was going to make this brief statement, so it is not being made in his absence, without his knowledge.

Furthermore, the floor of the House of Representatives is a poor and improper tribunal for the trial of a lawsuit. The Committee on the Judiciary of the House is zealous in its efforts to maintain the sanctity of the judiciary, and in doing this we have had very good success. If any Member of Congress has a substantial complaint, he should present the complaint to this committee, which would conduct a fair and full investigation. Would not this be better and fairer than publicly making a charge on the floor about a matter of which the Member cannot have full information? I do not know the details of the case against the three defendants from McMinn County to which the gentleman from Tennessee alluded. No one who was not present at the trial is in a position to pass judgment on the fairness of the sentence imposed. The newspaper accounts indicate the men proved good character, that one was in the armed forces, and the other two were working in a vital defense factory. These considerations undoubtedly were taken into account by the judge in fixing the sentence, as they should have been.

I know Judge Darr very well personally. I have practiced before him for 16 years. He has decided cases for and against my clients.

Of one thing I am absolutely sure, and that is that Judge Darr did what he thought was right and just, without fear and without regard to any outside influence. Judge Darr needs no defense from me. The high esteem in which he is held by the lawyers and people of his judicial district repudiate any implication of impropriety.

As a district judge and as a circuit judge for many years before he was elevated to the Federal bench, Judge Darr has made a remarkable record as a jurist of the best and highest type. He renders justice according to the law and the evidence, having in mind at all times the solemn obligations of his position. He is beyond approach or influence of any kind.

I regret that anyone has seen fit to disparage a man whom I consider one of the Nation's finest district judges.

Mr. STEARNS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Whereas Mr. and Mrs. William Dennis, of Keene, have set what is believed to be a national record by having contributed seven sons to the American armed forces; and

Whereas this notable accomplishment is another instance proving that New Hampshire's citizenry always rises completely and in unity to the occasion in times of national stress: Be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives hereby go on record as voicing its tribute to Mr. and Mrs. Dennis and the gallant fighting members of their family; and be it further

Resolved, That the clerk send a copy of these resolutions to Mr. and Mrs. William Dennis, of Keene.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1943

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, we come before Thy presence with thanksgiving. Thou who art the loftiest spirit of heaven and earth, we thank Thee that Thou hast endowed man, noble in feelings and in destiny. Thou hast left us doors to open, teaching us that meekness is courageous, that self-surrender is a mighty thing, and that the Golden Rule is heroic.

Dear Lord, as the joy of the sailor is in the harbor toward which he moves, likewise the force of the soul is in the propelling motives which sweep it on. Almighty God, we pray that these may be our credentials by which victory is won: Unity, directive wisdom, courage, zeal, and all above personal gain; Oh, let the tides of these virtues pour over our souls, "nor attempt the future's portal, by the past's blood-rusted key." Hold Thou the very focus of our minds to this living truth, that we are remade by the things which unmake us, renewed by that which would destroy us, and saved unto life by that which we call death. O Christ, as Thou didst fulfill Thy divine mission on the Cross and all creation was widened for man's salvation, inspire us to glory in sacrifice, distress, and restraint for the sake of liberty and union both now and forever. In the name of Him who is the hope of the world, Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order on Calendar Wednesday today be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

ADDITIONAL OFFICIAL REPORTER OF DEBATES

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution (H. Res. 134), and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That an additional position of official reporter of proceedings and debates of the House is hereby authorized at the rate of $7,500 per annum and the compensation thereof shall be paid from the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROTECTION OF HOUSE OFFICE BUILDINGS

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Appropriations Committee for the War Department I feel impelled to speak.

The War Department has been attacked and ridiculed for methods being used to protect the House Office Building here in Washington. In my opinion, the attack is unwise and does not represent the attitude of the Members of Congress.

I do not want the War Department to withhold guns from men who are fighting and dying in the battle zones in order to protect the House Office Building or officials in Washington. Washington is threatened not with bombs from without but with bombs from within.

If anybody in Washington is fearful of his own security here when men are dying in the battle zones of the South Pacific and North Africa, may heaven pity him.

If the War Department wants guns here, real or wooden, or no guns at all, it is all right with me. We must trust somebody.

Congress needs no protection. It only needs to prosecute a more effective policy for victory and the peace to follow.

Thinking in terms of all Americans at home, I say, not from bombs but from brainstorms, bickering, backbiting, and bungling, O Lord deliver us.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HÉBERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include a speech which I delivered over the radio.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

TEXTILE WORKERS

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, a joint announcement has just been made by the War and Navy Departments through their respective Under Secretaries, Patterson and Forrestal, that "textile makers meet all demands of services."

It is generally acknowledged that textiles are as essential in war as metal and powder. Needless to say, it is very gratifying to me, representing, as I do, a district containing so large a number of spindles and looms, to know that my people have thus attained their objective.

For some time now, all through my section of the country, special ceremonies have been held for conferring the awards by the Army and Navy upon industries reaching the high requirements assigned to them. From furnace, field, and factory in the South have gone countless young men and women into the armed forces. Our boys and girls are representing us at the far-flung battle fronts across the seven seas. With the siphoning away of these younger men and younger women, additional responsibilities have fallen upon the shoulders of others. "They also serve who follow the plow or stand behind the loom." It is, therefore, with great pride as the spokesman from a textile district to publicly commend both employer and employee for having met the rigid requirements and completing the task assigned to them. The problem of absenteeism does not prevail in our section, nor is there serious controversy between capital and labor.

With the announcement by the War and Navy Departments of the splendid achievements in the past on the part of our textile industries goes the assurance that all future requirements, however rigid, shall be promptly and fully met.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL, 1943

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Speaker, I am today sending a letter to Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau suggesting that the Treasury Department give consideration to setting up simplified facilities at the Union Station here and other centers of peak troop-transportation movement for the cashing of servicemen's pay checks 24 hours a day. Here is a service that would be of negligible cost and yet it would be of great assistance to our fighting men. Under current conditions, unless they are lucky, know someone, or can get to a bank during banking hours, about the only place they can cash their checks from Uncle Sam is in a place of low repute or some form of "clip joint." This service is a courtesy and accommodation that we owe to the men in the service of America.

COLUMBIA BASIN PROJECT

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 109, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 839) to amend the act approved May 27, 1937 (ch. 269, 50 Stat. 208), by providing substitute and additional authority for the prevention of speculation in lands of the Columbia Basin project, and substitute and additional authority related to the settlement and development of the project, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I shall later yield the usual 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN], a member of the Committee on Rules, and I now yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, this rule makes in order the consideration of H. R. 839, the so-called Grand Coulee Dam bill, also known as the Columbia Basin project bill.

Demand has been made by the State of Washington and the people in that section for favorable action upon this bill because it will require action on the part of the State legislature to prevent speculation in lands involved in this irrigation project.

Most of you know that we have spent about $160,000,000 on the Grand Coulee Dam. A great deal of land in that section of the country has and is being developed and is ready for irrigation. Many large property owners already are seeking to acquire additional land, because, naturally, after the land is irrigated it will be enhanced in value four or five times as much as it is worth today. This bill aims to prevent the speculation in and undue accumulation of that land by a few, to thus deprive many persons of the opportunity to obtain a fair amount of acreage at reasonable prices. This bill as it is drafted will provide—and I think this has been agreed between the State of Washington and the property owners—that each owner will be restricted to 160 acres. I myself have always believed that 40 acres of irrigated land is enough for any farmer to take care of, but to bring about harmony and the opening of the project without delay the interested persons have agreed on a limitation of 160 acres for each owner.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that immediate action should be taken on this measure because the Legislature of the State of Washington will shortly adjourn, and it is necessary that this proposed legislation pass and authority be given to the State and the people to bring about this adjustment on which they have worked for many, many years. I am aware that the distinguished Senator from Washington, Senator WALLGREN, who has the interest of the people of his State at heart, realizing the importance of this legislation, will urge Senate action without delay. Therefore I feel that the rule should be agreed to, and I hope the bill, which will be thoroughly explained by the gentleman from Utah [Mr. ROBINSON] and the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE], will pass without any opposition.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution makes in order the consideration of H. R. 839, a measure which will permit the reclamation and irrigation of the proposed Columbia Basin. This reclamation and irrigation work will be done under the policy laid down by the Congress in the reclamation law of 1902 and will permit the opening up of a considerable area of land for the use of small farmers.

This measure places a limitation of 160 acres upon the amount of land in this project that can be owned by any one individual. I am told that it will, when the water is taken to the land, include some of the richest dirt in all America.

The resolution was reported unanimously by the Committee on Rules. A number of Members of Congress appeared before the committee in support of the measure. I believe the bill should be given, not only full consideration, but the support of the House.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the previous question is ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 839) to amend the act approved May 27, 1937 (ch. 269, 50 Stat. 208), by providing substitute and additional authority for the prevention of speculation in lands of the Columbia Basin project, and substitute and additional authority related to the settlement and development of the project, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 839, with Mr. GAVAGAN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, much could be said about the policy of the Government and the development of this large farming area in the State of Washington known as the Columbia Basin project. There is a lot of history connected with this development. In the study of the project and its promotion many eminent men have been called in to investigate and pass on its merits. I distinctly recall that former President Hoover, when he was Secretary of Commerce, made a special trip and went over the entire project, and gave it his stamp of approval. I distinctly recall that the great and eminent engineer, Lt. Col. George W. Goethals, who built the Panama Canal, at the request of the Columbia Basin executive committee came to the State of Washington and went over this project. He also gave it his stamp of approval as being a feasible and worthwhile project.

Shortly after the advent of the present administration, as a result of the efforts that had been made by the State of Washington—I may say that the State of Washington has made numerous appropriations in support of this program from its State treasury—it was finally decided to construct the great Grand Coulee Dam, primarily for the purpose of bringing water onto these semiarid lands in the State of Washington.

The Government has now spent, I am told, some $140,000,000 in building this greatest dam and power project in the whole United States. It is now proposed in accordance with the original plan to pump water from the Columbia River some 200 feet into a large natural reservoir to be constructed by damming up the ends of the Grand Coulee, a defile running through the fertile wheatlands of Washington. The reservoir will be constructed 30 miles long and some 2 miles wide. Everything is to be done under the plan of the Reclamation Bureau of the Government in bringing settlers to this land and providing a means whereby the land can be colonized and settled up by these people, establishing farms through this fine farming section. The object of the bill is to prevent speculation, and provide that a settler when going on the land will not be loaded unnecessarily with various commitments and debts beyond any possibility for him to pay. The bill has been carefully considered by the committee and it comes to you with a unanimous report, all members of the committee agreeing to it. I hope that the bill will pass, and I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, because I am one of two of the minority members still remaining on the Irrigation and Reclamation Committee, the chairman has asked that I make a brief statement concerning H. R. 839. This bill is to prevent speculation in the lands to be irrigated and settled under the Grand Coulee Dam, some of which are private lands, some State, and some Federal.

Irrigation is the lifeblood of most of the farming lands in the 10 Western States. The annual waterfall in these States varies from 6 to 15 inches. In one steady rain in Washington you often get as much moisture as we do in my State of Colorado in a year. The problem of holding back the waters in the mountains in streams at their source by means of reservoirs and other devices is of vital importance. From these reservoirs ditches are built, many miles in length, to take the stored-up water as it is needed to the thirsty lands below.

Great irrigation and reclamation projects have been built by the Reclamation Service in my State, because in the Rocky Mountains is stored the waters that irrigate and drain the lands west to California, south to Mexico, and east to the Mississippi. Tunnels have been built to take the waters through mountains to fertile lands on the other side, and storage dams have been and will be built to hold these waters until needed for the dry lands below. Our people have prospered by the building of these projects, both public and private, but they have suffered in the past because of lack of proper legislation against speculation such as is here recommended.

Time and experience have shown where the mistakes have been made and subsequent legislation should be passed to help correct it in the future. In this bill the committee has undertaken to take from it as much of the governmental regimentation as was possible and to try to prevent unnecessary speculation in the irrigation and settlement of these 1,200,000 acres of land to be watered from the Grand Coulee Dam.

All last year the committee wrestled with a bill presented to it by the Department of the Interior on this subject. There was much objection to many of the provisions of that bill because of its socialistic and rehabilitation nature, and finally the whole bill was referred to a subcommittee to take out everything but the antispeculative part. This is the result of their work. The only clause that seems too broad in its scope is found on page 12 and the bill was reported with recommendation that this be stricken.

There are two principal provisions in this bill by which it is hoped speculation will be prevented. There is first a limitation on the size of plots which can be acquired or conveyed. The Reclamation Act of 1937 provided for plots of 40 to 80 acres, but this bill, H. R. 839, allows up to 160 acres, which is generally conceded to be all one family can handle. Secondly, the consideration to be charged is restricted to the appraised value and means are provided whereby the present owners of land can dispose of their excess holdings in a satisfactory way. The reasons for these provisions are plain: Speculators are precluded from getting hold of large parcels of land and holding back settlement until an inflated price can be charged for their holdings. These speculative features expire 5 years after the land comes under irrigation, although no person may ever own more than 160 acres of land under this project.

The development of this project is not contemplated until after the war. The settlement of the public lands of the West helped to satisfy the boys returning from our other wars. These lands are pretty well gone today, but this great development for the settlement of 1,200,000 acres of newly irrigated land offers some solution for the returning soldiers and sailors who want to return to the soil.

To the best of my knowledge this legislation is fair; it is sound; it is necessary.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROCKWELL. Yes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. It is not contemplated that this development will be made during the present war?

Mr. ROCKWELL. Not at all. That is my understanding.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. And the gentleman thinks it will assure homes for some of our boys when they come back from the services?

Mr. ROCKWELL. That is the intention.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. And no person can acquire more than 160 acres.

Mr. ROCKWELL. That is correct.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. How are these appraisements to be made? I see that they can only be obtained at the appraised value. Who is the appraiser?

Mr. ROCKWELL. My understanding is that the appraisal is made by a neutral group of farmers in a particular section. In other words, the lands in one particular part may be worth considerably more than the land in another part.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. And this provides for capable and disinterested appraisers to make a fair appraisal of the land?

Mr. ROCKWELL. That is my understanding.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROCKWELL. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. One of the prime purposes of this bill is to prevent speculation on the part of large property owners, is it not?

Mr. ROCKWELL. That is correct.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. I understand then that this resolves itself into this, that the Federal Government fixes the sale price of this land.

Mr. ROCKWELL. It does for 5 years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. Mr. Chairman, the major purpose of H. R. 839 is to control speculation in Columbia Basin lands, to render more secure the investment of the Federal Government in the Grand Coulee Dam project, and to provide for the orderly development thereof. Prompt passage of this legislation will make the reclamation features of the project available for construction at the end of the present World War should Congress then desire to utilize the project to cushion the shock resulting from the demobilization of wartime industry and of our armed forces.

EARLY PASSAGE OF LEGISLATION NECESSARY

The passage of this legislation before February 20, 1943, is vitally necessary if the project is to be ready for construction at the end of the present World War. It is necessary that the Legislature of the State of Washington ratify this legislation, and the legislature meets in January of 1943 and will not meet again for 2 years. After ratification by the legislature, the water contracts can then be submitted for the approval of the landowners at the district elections. After this is done the contracts must be validated by the courts and recordable contracts executed by each landowner.

PROJECT AUTHORIZED IN 1935

The Grand Coulee Dam project, including the Grand Coulee Dam, power plant, and irrigation canals, was authorized by Congress under the provisions of the act of August 30, 1935 (49 Stat. 1028). Approximately $160,000,000 has already been allocated or appropriated for the construction of the Grand Coulee Dam and power plant on the Columbia River in the State of Washington. This great development has already proved its value in serving many large defense industries with electric power.

ANTISPECULATION ACT OF 1937

On May 27, 1937, Congress approved an act—chapter 269, 50 Statutes 208—to prevent speculation in and to implement the orderly development of the 1,200,000 acres of irrigable land in the project. This act was intended to make the lands available to the settlers at prices established by careful Government appraisals, disregarding any incremented values resulting from project construction. These appraisals, which are of record, have been approved as fair and equitable by the landowners and by the directors of the three Columbia Basin irrigation districts which embrace substantially all of the lands to be irrigated.

DEFECTS IN 1937 ACT

After extensive studies made by Federal and State experts under the direction of the Bureau of Reclamation, and in collaboration with the landowners and their representatives, it was discovered that the 1937 Antispeculation Act required amendment if control over speculation in lands was to be made effective, and if the Federal investment in the project was to be rendered amply secure. Under the 1937 act, farm ownership was limited to 40 acres in the case of a single person, and to 80 acres in the case of a married person, instead of to a unit of a size and productivity capable of supporting a family. In the case of a sale of excess land for a price in excess of the appraised value, the purchaser was penalized instead of the seller. There was no provision whereby holders of large wheat farms, occupying about one-third of the best project lands, could dispose of their excess acreage without selling it piecemeal. While the owners of these lands favor irrigation, many have indicated that they would exclude their lands from the project rather than assume the burden of selling the same a parcel at a time. To preserve these valuable lands within the project boundaries, it was deemed wise to provide for their acquisition, if necessary.

RECLAMATION PROJECT ACT OF 1939

Since the Anti-Speculation Act of 1937 was enacted, Congress has approved a general reclamation act known as the Reclamation Project Act of 1939. To bring the Grand Coulee Dam project clearly within the general provisions of the 1939 act, and thereby further safeguard the Federal investment in the project, it has also been necessary to amend the 1937 Anti-Speculation Act.

H. R. 7722

After extensive hearings the House Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation unanimously reported out H. R. 7722. This bill amends the Anti-Speculation Act of 1937 so as to correct the defects heretofore mentioned. Farms are to range in size from 10 acres, near towns, to 160 acres, depending upon soil, climate, and location. The Secretary of the Interior is given authority to purchase lands, both within and without the project. This authority is granted to enable the Secretary to purchase the large wheat farms, if necessary, and such portions thereof that are outside the project but adjacent thereto. It is believed by those familiar with the project that the investment involved in land purchased will be relatively small, since it is believed there will be little difficulty for the landowners to sell their excess holdings to other settlers. It is believed, however, that the granting of this authority to the Secretary will prevent the withdrawal from the project of some of its best lands.

NO EXPENDITURES UNTIL AFTER THE WAR

Except for the construction of the Grand Coulee Dam power plant and balancing reservoir, no expenditures under this legislation are contemplated until after the war. The War Production Board has already stopped all construction on the project except the installation of some generators, and work necessary to maintenance of the dam and power plant. When the war is over it will then be the duty of Congress to determine if it wants to proceed with the construction of the irrigation features of the project.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. I yield.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I believe this covers 1,200,000 acres?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. That is correct.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. How much of that is owned by the Federal Government?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. Not to exceed 10 percent.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. How much of it is owned by private individuals?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. Approximately 80 or 90 percent.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The gentleman has stated that there are persons who own four or five thousand acres in this project. By what process is title taken from those private owners and made available to the Government?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. Those private owners agree to sell at a price that has already been appraised and fixed, to the Federal Government, and the Federal Government then sells to the individuals.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. They sell it to the Federal Government?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. They sell it to the Federal Government and the Federal Government turns it over to the farmers.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. That has already been agreed upon?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. That is correct.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman. will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. I understand that it would not be possible for anyone to buy any of this land for the purpose of speculation, but it may be bought for the purpose of investment?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. No one can get more than 160 acres; no family.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. What I am getting at is this: How do you distinguish between investment and speculation?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. We do not distinguish. We just provide that each unit be fixed, and fix it at enough so that it will support a family. In some areas which are very rich it is only 10 acres. In others it will be 40 acres. The most it can be is 160 acres. So that no family can own in this particular section more than 160 acres of land.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Investment and speculation have had much to do with the development of all economies, here and elsewhere. What is the ultimate effect going to be on the economy where you eliminate both the possibility of investment and of speculation?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. Of course, there can be no investment for 5 years. After 5 years it is released then, and it will proceed along the lines of any other activity.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Speculation or anything else?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. Yes.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. I yield.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. From what little experience I have had in the Northwest, it seems to me that speculation is what has caused a great deal of the trouble in the past.

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. That is right.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. They get people to move on there with rose-colored glasses, and afterward they found they had it so high that they could not operate on that basis, and that is the reason you have this bill here today.

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. That is exactly right.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is the effect of this bill to put the Federal Government in a position to acquire this land basically as if it were public domain by reason of these present owners selling their land to the Government at the appraised price?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. That is correct.

Mr. CRAWFORD. So, then, having attained the status of public domain, the Government proceeds to sell this land to what we will call homesteaders?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. That is correct.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Under some agreed plan?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. That is right.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Do I understand that the maximum amount which a given family can acquire under this procedure is 160 acres of land or 160 acres of land subject to irrigation?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. It is 160 acres of irrigated land. They can own any amount of land that is not irrigated.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In other words, if there is a piece of land that has an acreage of 160 acres subject to irrigation, and another 160 or 320 acres which may be strictly grazing and not subject to irrigation, that one family might also have that, under this general procedure?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. That is correct.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The appraised value of the respective acreages has not yet been completed, has it?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. It is not entirely completed, although on most of the areas it is well under way, and in some areas I understand it has been at least partly completed.

Mr. CRAWFORD. When will they begin selling these so-called homesteads?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. Just as soon as they can get authority to do it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In other words, when this legislation becomes law and you set up the machinery, they are on the way?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. And when the State of Washington passes similar legislation.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the purchasers of that land owe an obligation to the Federal Government?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. So that it will be a transaction between the Federal Government and the farmers?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. Through the Bureau of Reclamation; yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Now suppose you or I with a family had a son or a daughter, say 20 years of age, unmarried, living with the father and mother, that family then could purchase an acreage of land with 160 acres subject to irrigation. Could that family also proceed, before that son or daughter is married, but having in mind that they will soon be married, to purchase another 160 acres in the name of the adult child?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. This only provides for a family up until the age of 18. After they reach the age of 18, then there is a provision for this land to be acquired by people over that age.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Utah [Mr. ROBINSON] has expired.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] did not point out the danger that I see in this bill. This looks to me like a subsidy to those people who are to purchase this land, at the expense of the Grand Coulee project.

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. No.

Mr. RANKIN. It looks like a subsidy from the Federal Government. What are you selling this land for? What is it proposed to sell this land for to these people? To sell it at whatever it cost? As a matter of fact, the landholders who will own this land can make their own irrigation district, purchase the water power from the Grand Coulee project, and do everything the Bureau of Reclamation is trying to do except they would not get a subsidy. Now, is not that the situation?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. No; that is not correct.

Mr. RANKIN. Let me warn you gentlemen out in that country. There is not a man in this House who has struggled harder for the development of the Columbia River than I. I have not had time to read this bill carefully, but it looks to me as if you are trying to subsidize these people who own this land or put it in the hands of the Bureau of Reclamation for Government control of farming in that area.

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. I wish to say to the gentleman that I feel that when he reads this bill his mind will be completely changed. There is no other way by which either the State of Washington or the Federal Government, or the owners can get at this problem other than the way we are getting at it here, and this is not going to cost the Federal Government anything. Ultimately it is not going to be at the expense of the Grand Coulee Dam. On the other hand this is going to provide a market for every kilowatt of power that is produced at the Grand Coulee Dam; there will be a big reservoir market for the Grand Coulee Dam power.

Mr. RANKIN. In other words, according to the gentleman's statement, it is proposed to exhaust the power of the greatest dam on earth to irrigate some extra land that you say now is not worth $10 an acre. The purpose is to bring it into production and competition with the farmers of that area and throughout the country.

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. If I said that I said something I did not intend to say.

Mr. RANKIN. Grand Coulee Dam is the greatest power dam on earth.

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. I do not believe the gentleman from Mississippi and I are talking to the same purpose. Let us get straightened out.

Mr. RANKIN. What are you going to sell this land at?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. It will be sold at various prices.

Mr. RANKIN. What?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. Most of it at $85 an acre.

Mr. WHITE. The dry land at not over $10 an acre.

Mr. RANKIN. How much?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. With water on it it will be sold at $85. At the present time it is worth between $5 and $10 an acre.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is the dry land price.

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; but you are going to utilize the power of the dam to get water on this land and the result is that this project is going to be subsidized indirectly at the expense of the Federal Government and the power consumers along the Columbia River. If this is the program, I want to warn you people in that area that you certainly will stir up a hornet's nest in this House if that develops, when I have an opportunity to study this bill.

Mr. WHITE and Mr. O'CONNOR rose.

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. I yield first to the chairman of the committee [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE. I simply want to set the gentleman from Mississippi right: The features he objects to have all been taken out of the bill. That was done when we revised it.

Mr. RANKIN. If they have been taken out, the gentleman admits that they were in the original program.

Mr. WHITE. This bill has been considerably revised. No; I do not admit they were in the original program. There were certain things that put burdens on the settlers that we took out of the bill because we did not want to get into the matter of financing the construction of buildings and things like that; we want to let the settlers work out their own salvation. We will put water on the land but let them proceed from that point forward.

Mr. RANKIN. I promised Members of the House—and I say "I" because of the great interest I took in the development of these Columbia River projects—but those of us who worked so hard for the power development promised these men from other sections of the country who were protesting against irrigating additional land at Government expense, that that would not be done, but that power would be developed, and that if this power was to be used for irrigation purposes it would be sold to these people at the same rate it was sold to anybody else.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. None of this power is going to be used for irrigation purposes. If any is sold to any of these people it will be sold at the same rates that it is sold to anyone else.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. For the benefit of the gentleman from Mississippi, is it not true that the development of this very project was part of the inducement for the building of the Grand Coulee Dam at a cost of approximately $160,000,000, and that it was at that time contemplated to develop this very irrigation district under the plan which is now being evolved by this bill?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. That is correct.

Mr. BALDWIN of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. BALDWIN of Maryland. What will be the result of opening up more farm land than can possibly be used during this emergency? When the war is over these additional acres will come in competition with the acreage of this country on which we have been spending billions of dollars to curtail production because we had too many farms operating. By this bill we are creating an additional million acres, which will further complicate the farm problem during the reconstruction period after the war is over.

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. None of this land will be opened up for several years. We have already learned that we do not have too many acres under cultivation. We may have thought that at one time, but we have concluded that that is not a fact. Further, the crops that are raised on these reclamation projects do not come into competition with the regular farm crops of the Eastern and Southern States.

Mr. BALDWIN of Maryland. Does not the gentleman realize that before this war crops raised in California and on projects in other States similar to this project were receiving prices so low that they were not even worth the price of harvesting because they were so abundant? So much land had been opened up that the farmers had no market for their crops, and this created a real problem. We were going to have quotas placed on those crops just before the war started, just as we had wheat and cotton quotas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. I do not agree with the gentleman as to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Utah has expired.

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON].

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman, we come together today and all these present days under the dark shadow of the announcements of the successful bombing of our transports, the defeat of our Army, and the loss of hundreds of our boys. With heavy hearts we turn to the business of the day. To all the thousands of our people waiting in the anguish of anticipation of further news let us extend our sympathy and understanding.

In considering the bill before us there are certain principles to be dealt with that are far more important than the bill itself. These principles should be the background of all our legislation, they should guide us at every point.

We must be certain that the basic intent and purpose of everything we do is to further the war effort, and to protect our economy. Set up against such a background, we can then strip each bill of such provisions as may confuse or retard or stultify the war effort. We can then see our own actions more objectively and so keep ourselves from being swayed by sectional differences and selfishness.

The bill before us, to justify itself on this basis, must make possible the increase of food and other agricultural materials. Only the imperative needs should influence our decisions. We should ask ourselves, Are the provisions of this bill going to give us a greater supply of these fundamentals that are the sources of energy that must be generated if we are to have strong fighting men, well equipped for battle, and a civilian army able to carry the load?

I confess I find myself trying to evaluate the bill challenged by the thought of our men overseas. They are facing the stark realities of the most brutalizing war of all history. With death on every hand they are not concerned with parities, with subsidies, with penalties. They are not interested in overtime payments—the hours they know are based upon necessity—with life or death on their pay checks. They look to us for the tools of war. They expect us to measure up to their need.

Last week there was much discussion on this floor about peanuts. Today we speak of irrigations. Peanuts are one of the sources of oils for lubrication of machines and for sustenance of human life. Water is the life of the soil. We must give all these matters careful consideration.

We may seem to spend overmuch time on these little things, for, to many, peanuts are insignificant bits that spell circuses and parades rather than oil, and irrigation is something they know nothing of. To them I would say that we are not concerned with little things because we want to be, but because we have to be.

Those who have come from the captured and enslaved countries tell us that the invaders first made very certain not of the gold which was controlled, but of taking the foods containing oil, for oil is the life, the sight, the blood, the tissue, the vitality of the adult soldier, just as it is of the infant child; without water nothing lives. So I would point out that upon these so-called unimportant matters does the future of our Army and of our children rest.

So when we give our final judgments, can we not base them at all times upon just one thing, the need of our armies and of our people for the vital products of the earth and of the machines? Can we not set aside every suggestion of sectionalism and selfish interest and think only of these fundamentals? To meet our full responsibility must we not lift ourselves out of all bickering and disorder into a place where everything we say and all we do protects our production and our economy?

I am not preaching; this is simply the picture as I see it. But I am clarifying what is in my own heart and in the hearts of all mothers; yes, of all wives and fathers, too, as we brace ourselves to meet the continuing tragedies that are upon us. I claim the right and the privilege to say these things, because I am the mother of two sons in the service. Like every other mother I am perfectly aware of the drama of defeat being enacted in north Africa. I am willing and ready to bear my share of tragedy if God so wills. Indeed, I would not have it otherwise.

But as a Member of this body, this occurs to me. The people in their pain may turn and ask, What is Congress doing? To what principles do our Representatives adhere? To my mind, we must so govern our actions that we can say to them in all sincerity:

We know there is no use of putting up a wailing wall in our hearts for our dead in an attempt to hide our inadequacy. We know that we of the Congress must be increasingly aware, increasingly responsible. We know that to meet our full responsibility we must lift ourselves into a place where we work together for the protection of our production and our economy. For whether we like to admit it or not, these are the things for which our men die, or have to live on, hideously maimed in body, mind, or soul.

The country needs to feel confidence in this Congress. The mothers of our fighting forces need to know that when we spend time on small-seeming things we do so because those very things are crucial to the life and spirit that sustains their sons. They should feel somewhat comforted and reassured as they stop to realize that even though I happen to be the only woman in the House with sons who are in the line, a very large number of you, my honored colleagues, wear service stars, as do I. To us especially is the need for awareness and the sense of responsibility a vital, throbbing reality.

It is for us to infuse the other Members of this Congress with our own burning desire to clear away confusions, to use our mistakes constructively, that we may sustain our fighting forces and build, bit by bit, the great army behind the army that will provide every fighting man of ours and of our allies as well with everything essential to his need and vital to his spirit.

To do this we must protect the smallest link in our economic structure as a Nation, that we may keep faith with the boys who have gone out from our homes.

I have tried to express what I know is your thought and feeling as it is my own, that the country may know the underlying principles of our actions and the determination of our designs.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. BOLTON. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. WHITE. The gentlewoman from Ohio has made a splendid presentation of American ideals, which has my full sympathy and support.

Mrs. BOLTON. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WHITE. I hope the gentlewoman will take into consideration the fact that after the Civil War the fertile lands of Kansas, Nebraska, and Iowa awaited the returning soldiers. We are trying to do here what they did then, so that when our soldiers return they will find fertile irrigated lands awaiting them in the State of Washington for settlement.

Mrs. BOLTON. I appreciate very much what the gentleman means.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman has expired.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to attempt to go into the details of this bill. I think the gentleman from Idaho, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, and the distinguished gentleman from Utah, chairman of the Committee on Public Roads, have gone into the bill very carefully. However, there are a few matters to which I wish to call attention specifically.

One is that all expenditures under this irrigation project on the part of the Government are reimbursable, and all expenditures under irrigation projects in the past throughout the western country have been reimbursable. The percentage of repayment is very close to 94 percent, so you can see that the Federal Government is taking little or no chances whatever in the development of this great project.

Already $160,000,000 has been expended in the development of what is known as the Grand Coulee Dam. It was built as a dual project, for power and for irrigation. At the time the money was expended, the development of this great area of dry land was one of the inducements which caused the Government to build the dam.

May I also call your attention to the fact that at all times the Congress of the United States will have its hands on the purse strings. No money can be expended under the operation of this bill without first being appropriated by Congress. This bill carries an authorization only for the purchase of land, and the land can only be bought when the money is appropriated by the Congress. Consequently, there should be no opposition to this bill at all. If we were not going to go ahead with the development of this irrigation project close to the Grand Coulee Dam it would be questionable whether it was the part of wisdom for the Government to go ahead and expend that money on that project.

It may be that many gentlemen in the East, the North, and the Central States do not consider that this project might not be worth while but the project might very properly be termed an enlargement of our domestic market—that is, increased markets for all manufactured goods and machinery.

Whenever you create an irrigation district and bring into cultivation land that has been heretofore lying out in the sun producing nothing but squirrels, prairie dogs, and some grass here and there, and bring into production such as forage crops, that in turn produce cattle and sheep, then you create a market for the manufacture of farm implements, household furniture, clothing of all kinds, and of harness, automobiles, and various other kinds of machinery in the States of Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, Michigan, New York, Connecticut, and other States. Likewise you create a market for all kinds of foodstuffs not locally grown. You can go into my town, which is located in the midst of an irrigation district, and you will find on the shelves of the merchants goods from nearly every State in the Union. You will find there clothing from New York and cotton goods from the South, and manufactured goods of every kind from every State where there is manufacturing, so that nearly every State benefits from these projects.

Mr. WHITE. Does not the settlement of these projects bring about a great expansion of markets in every section of the country?

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is correct.

Mr. GRANGER. And this legislation does not set up any precedent heretofore not in force?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, no. Congress has adopted this plan heretofore. This bill simply amends a law passed by Congress. It has been pointed out that we should not develop more land because it will bring into production competitive crops. That is not true. The crops produced on these reclamation areas as a rule are forage crops, not produced in other sections of the country, and, in addition to creating an enlargement of general markets, it creates a great beef production and sheep production. A few moments ago something was said about there being too much food produced a few years ago. I take issue with that statement. Never was there too much food produced to meet the needs of the American people. There was simply too much food produced to meet the market demand because the people had no money with which to buy the food, and when pigs were being killed and cotton was being plowed under and grain was being destroyed there were hungry people in the United States and people who had nothing on their backs. To repeat, there never was a time when there was too much produced, and at the very time they were destroying the crops and killing the pigs people were hungry and people were in need of clothing. If sufficient sheets and pillowcases were put on all of the beds in the country, and if babies and children had been supplied with the needed cotton clothing, there never would have been a surplus of cotton; and if these undernourished children had been properly fed, there would have been no surplus of either meats or grains. I do not believe in an economy of scarcity and never have.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. GROSS. The bill says that this is to prevent speculation in land. Will the gentleman explain what there is in the bill that will prevent that?

Mr. O'CONNOR. No man, first of all, can own over 160 acres of land under water. He can irrigate only 160 acres of land. He cannot get any more than that. If it were not for this bill, these big corporations could go in and buy up this land and create a monopoly on it and force the Government to pay exorbitant prices. The yardstick by which the Government is going to buy this land is on a dry-land price. Dry-land price in the West is somewhere between $1.50 and $5 an acre. There is not a chance for speculation—speculation always comes first.

Mr. GROSS. And how long will this prevent speculation in the land?

Mr. O'CONNOR. For a period of 5 years.

Mr. GROSS. And what is the ceiling price on this land?

Mr. O'CONNOR. The ceiling is fixed by the cost of the water and the land. The Government is not going to make one cent, neither is the Government going to lose one cent, because all of this indebtedness is reimbursable.

Mr. GROSS. Then would $85 be the ceiling on that land?

Mr. WHITE. Eighty-five dollars will be to put water on the land. Then on top is cost of land. That same indebtedness will be assumed by the settler and paid out over a long period of time by annual payments.

Mr. GROSS. I am a member of this committee, and I am interested in this bill. You are telling me that this $85 will buy the land and the cost of the water, and that will be the ceiling price on this land for 5 years.

Mr. O'CONNOR. No; $85 will put the water on the land; then on top will be the cost of the land.

Mr. GROSS. And how long does that stand?

Mr. O'CONNOR. It stands for 5 years.

Mr. GROSS. Then I could not sell it for 5 years for more than $85, but after 5 years I could sell it for $90.

Mr. WHITE. That is correct.

Mr. GROSS. Is it not true that a poor fellow that could not stick around would have to sell it at $85 and the other fellow that would get it second hand, at the beginning of the second year, could sell it for $90?

Mr. O'CONNOR. There is no chance under this bill for the man to be forced out of the land, because he has the Government back of him.

Mr. CASE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. CASE. I was going to point out that in section 3 there is a provision which requires that the purchase contract guarantee to the vendee a right to recover from the vendor or the grantor an amount equal to the payments made in excess of the appraised value. So that there is a specific provision for recovery in case of a sale above the appraised value.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Exactly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Montana has again expired.

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HORAN].

Mr. HORAN. Mr. Chairman, I am happy to have this opportunity to speak on this bill, as it concerns my own State of Washington.

I want to point out right here that we are not trying reclamation at this time. This is not a new bill. It forms no new policies. All that we are trying to do is to set up a stronger, a fairer, and more just protection for these boys that the gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON] spoke of, the boys who will be coming home from overseas and who want to go out upon the land and attain something of American independence. To me this is strictly a nonpartisan task that is before us today. To justify the time and attention of this Congress it should be in the direction of making greater, secure, and more productive the soil that is affected by reclamation. Our job is to create more taxpayers in America. The sense of this act that we are passing judgment on today will assure just that.

I think it is well to remind the committee also that the effect of this act must be to build confidence on the part of those who may aspire to go out on the land, confidence in the land itself and in the Government that will make it available to them.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORAN. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. As I understand, some of this land is privately owned, and while the principle may be good, does not this legislation seek to establish a new principle by placing a limitation upon the price that a private individual can secure for his land?

Mr. CASE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORAN. I yield.

Mr. CASE. That provision is already in existing law. Several of the reclamation laws provide for such a restriction—that is, they carry an antispeculation provision.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. As far as privately owned lands are concerned?

Mr. CASE. Yes. I know we have it in the so-called Wheeler-Case Act for the small Great Plains projects, and I think it is in the new General Reclamation Act in principle, if not in the same form as here. The principle is to prevent private speculative benefits on Government expenditures. It only means that they cannot get water above a certain acreage. It does not say that they may not continue to own land, but before they get the benefit of water that is provided by Government expenditure they must agree that they will sell their excess lands.

Mr. HORAN. The point hinges on whether a private owner has a right to make unlimited profit out of improvements placed on the property by such a development at the expense of the Government, so we place a restriction on that for 5 years, because of the fact that speculation in land quite often raises the capital debt of anyone going on the land to the point where he is forced out of business.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORAN. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. What made you select 5 years?

Mr. HORAN. That was done under pressure. You know, we have had quite a bit of discussion over this. Personally I have known nothing but reclamation projects all my life, and I do not think that 5 years is quite enough.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. As I understand the principle involved is protection against speculation. Why do you limit this protection to 5 years? Why not make it permanent? If the good, great, big Government of the United States wants to be so kind to these people, I cannot understand why you want it to give them this protection against speculation for a few years and then throw them to the dogs.

Mr. HORAN. We are assuming they will be established on their property by that time and can take care of themselves.

Mr. CASE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORAN. I yield.

Mr. CASE. I recall the discussion that came up on that point in consideration of previous legislation. Some wanted to limit it to 3 years. Five years was adopted as a compromise, I think. Furthermore, there are other factors that eventually enter into the rise in prices of land, and it would deny consideration of other factors in the price of land if the limitation were to exist in perpetuity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2½ additional minutes.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORAN. I yield.

Mr. HILL. In order to set the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH] straight on this, if I understand the matter correctly in my mind regarding speculation, there are two kinds of speculation that you and I know about on irrigation projects—namely, the speculation that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH] speaks about is speculation after the land has been irrigated, after it is all under this fine cultivation that is second to none in the world. The other speculation is before the land is ready. That is the kind of speculation that this bill tries to eliminate. Those men go in and pick up this land before it is touched, and they hang onto it and do nothing to it whatsoever, and then the Government comes in and gets it all ready, like a garden, and then they are ready to sell their land. This bill puts a quietus on that kind of operations. The gentleman from Ohio should support the bill from that angle.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HORAN. I yield.

Mr. PHILLIPS. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. HILL] has stated most of what I intended to say. The period of speculation in a proposition of this kind is before it gets going and when it gets into distress.

Mr. HORAN. That is right.

Mr. PHILLIPS. And one purpose of this bill is to attempt to prevent speculation at the start before the permanent settlers have time to get on it.

Mr. HORAN. I thank the gentleman for bringing out that point so very clearly. The whole point is this: In my own district in Washington at the time of the depression we had a mortgage debt against every acre in our district that averaged $750, showing that when you allow values to go hog wild it gets beyond the ability of the owners to handle.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, at the outset, before my time is consumed, I must say I am not only a member of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, reporting the bill, but also of the subcommittee to which the earlier bill was submitted for redrafting. Accordingly, I have given double thought to this particular bill before us today and am thoroughly satisfied with it. I approve it; I think it ought to be passed unanimously today.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. Briefly.

Mr. GROSS. This bill gives the Secretary of the Interior the authority to establish town sites on this land. Has such authority ever been granted in similar legislation before to the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. MURDOCK. My information is that it has been done. In the carrying out of these projects we give the right to the Bureau of Reclamation to establish districts. That is what we mean by saying the Secretary is authorized to do so-and-so, meaning the Bureau of Reclamation in the Department.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. I may state for the information of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the authority to establish town sites has been in the law ever since I can remember. I personally was connected with one of these town sites in the State of Idaho for 16 years.

Mr. GROSS. Is it not true, however, that a Secretary could come along and establish a town site to suit himself irrespective of the possible needs of the people already there?

Mr. MURDOCK. I will answer the gentleman's question; then, Mr. Chairman, I cannot yield further, for my time is too limited. We can imagine a lot of things if we turn our fancy or prejudice free. If we are to have such great projects we must give some discretion to the Secretary or some official and that we have always done.

Mr. Chairman, there were some controversial features in the original bill, but those, I believe, have all been taken out. One or two things pertaining to what has already been said here today should be cleared up, however.

I notice the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], the great advocate of public power, had a question with regard to the bill. He seemed to fear this bill might subsidize farmers at the expense of the power consumers of the area. I want to point out, coming as I do from a reclamation portion of the country, that when we build dams and reservoirs in the West, we do it these days with more than one object in view. When we build dams they may be solely for flood control or simply for power purposes, or for impounding water for irrigation. In recent years two or more of these objects have been the multiple purpose of their construction. Now, the great reclamation policy which was inaugurated under the Newlands Act in 1902 has developed to a thing of very tremendous value to the entire West. These vast reclamation projects are established and constructed on engineering data. Government engineers are careful to estimate the cost of the whole project, and there is applied to flood control, or to power, or to irrigation its proportionate cost of the whole project; and, mind you this, Mr. Chairman, every one of these projects is reimbursable, so that part which is attributable to power production is repayable to the Treasury from the sale of power and that part of the cost which is assessable against irrigation is repayable over a period of 40 years, with interest. The men who go out there pioneering and establish homes and turn these desert acres into productive farms ultimately pay back every penny into the Federal Treasury which has been paid out. That is a point which all should be careful to remember.

Having said this, let me get to the matter uppermost in my heart, after listening with solicitude, sympathy, and full accord to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Mrs. BOLTON] a few minutes ago. She spoke with feeling, because she is doing her duty as a Member of this House in these trying war days in the light of her being a mother of two sons in the service. I want to say to my good friend from Ohio that I can appreciate that point of view, for I, too, have two sons in active service, one on the firing line in Africa. I, too, am thinking of this and every other measure we pass here now in the light of what it contributes to this war.

What part does irrigation play in our war effort, and what part may it play for our boys after the war is ended? I want to point out to my friends two things in answer to that. Some may think of the great State of Arizona as a desert. I want to remind you that Arizona agriculture produces $100,000,000 annually and that 98 percent of all we produce there by way of food and fiber is produced under irrigation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 2 additional minutes.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. How much of the long-staple cotton, so vital to the airplane industry, is produced in Arizona now or would be if Arizona did not have irrigation?

Mr. MURDOCK. Not a fiber would be produced without irrigation, and I thank the gentleman for raising that question and extending my time.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. No; I have not time.

In the year 1942 the State of Arizona produced more than $100,000,000 in cash value in food and fiber; and, mind you, practically all of that was produced under irrigation. Among the fibers, the long-staple cotton, 1½ inches in length, is the one in which the War Department is so greatly interested, or SXP, the finest grade which is used in parachutes and barrage balloons. This is so vital that the President on yesterday issued an Executive order permitting the harvesting of that crop by the Army. The production of that cotton is one of the most vital aspects in our whole war effort. There could not be a boll of that cotton grown without irrigation. The same thing applies to guayule rubber, the natural rubber plant which we are growing down in Yuma County, and in other parts of the Southwest. I know of nothing more vital to war needs than this long-fiber cotton for parachutes, or than this natural rubber guayule plant, yet we must grow both under irrigation.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. WHITE. That cotton is so vital today that we are sending the Army, under the Army command, into the fields to harvest it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes, that is what I had reference to by the unique action of the President yesterday. I say that those now desert acres—whether they be in the Columbia Basin or elsewhere in the arid section, there being now several million acres in the Columbia Basin possible of development from Grand Coulee Dam—are the agricultural hope of the country and we ought to develop them.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. May I make this observation to see if the gentleman does not agree with me. One of the primary purposes of this bill is to provide homes and employment for the very boys who are in the front line today defending our country.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman has expressed exactly the other thought I had in mind. A reading of the hearings on this bill will show that I pointed that out in the hearings. I, too, want to prepare some place for these boys returning from the Army at the close of the war, that they may make homes and establish themselves on the soil.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arizona has expired.

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HOLMES].

Mr. HOLMES of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I rise to urge the passage of this bill, H. R. 839. I do so because I am familiar with the area, with the program, and with what it will mean to our country. This entire development lies in my district.

I call to your attention a very important point, that we are not establishing a precedent. This has been done before, I am advised, as early as 1926, under the Coolidge administration.

Second, may I emphasize the fact that this $160,000,000 project, now producing power for the great war effort, for the development of magnesite, steel rolling mills, and aluminum in our area was established by the Bureau of Reclamation and built and engineered by the Bureau of Reclamation, to develop along with this great power project the placing of water upon these 1,200,000 acres of land.

Third, this bill does not call for an appropriation and is not an appropriation bill. It is merely an act to keep speculation from creeping into the handling of this vast acreage of land on the part of individuals who may want to control huge acreages for speculative purposes.

Fourth, the private landowners in this area are all in favor of this procedure and are willing to comply and want to comply with this program.

Fifth, this land has been appraised and is in the process of being appraised. The prices are acceptable to the private landowners.

Last, may I emphasize that this is an enabling act to start a program for the development of land for our returning soldiers. It will take us from 2 to 3 years to enter into the individual contracts with the individuals who will want to buy land under this project, and to establish those contracts. We need to have these prices known to the individuals who wish to purchase this land.

This project will enable the settlement of approximately 20,000 new farmers.

All these points, supporting this program of reclamation in the great State of Washington, make it imperative upon me to place before you a sincere request that you give this bill your serious consideration. I urge its passage.

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. STOCKMAN].

Mr. STOCKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am extremely glad to be here in the well of the House today to urge your favorable consideration and passage of this bill, which has been so well explained and spoken for by my colleagues from the great State of Washington.

As a member of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, I have been in favor of this bill, especially since I personally know the conditions under which this project is to be handled. I was born and have lived all my life within 50 miles of this project. I have seen almost every acre on it. I am personally familiar with the Grand Coulee Dam.

We, as a government, have $160,000,000 invested in this great project, which has three primary considerations, flood control, power, and irrigation, and the irrigation is by no means the least consideration. We now have the feature of flood control, we have the feature of power, and we need the feature of irrigation which this bill will provide and which this committee has brought before you for your consideration.

This land is approximately 1,000,000 acres of the poorest land in the United States as it is today, without water, but the finest land in the world with water. There is plenty of water for every acre of this land. It is level enough to take it cheaply. We have people to put on this land, and, especially after this war, we will want the acreage this land will provide for homes. It will take from 2 to 5 years to make a single acre of this land available, so it is especially important at this time that we prepare the way for the use of this land at a time when we want it and must have it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN].

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Chairman, yesterday afternoon one of our colleagues called attention to the fact that some of the guns placed here on the office buildings for our protection are dummy guns. It is not my purpose to criticize my colleague for giving away what may have been military secrets, but I fear that the impression may have gone out as a result of that that the Capital City of the United States is not adequately defended against air attack. I had several officers in my office this morning who are charged with the responsibility of defending the District of Columbia against air attack. They came to see me because I happen to be a Reserve officer in antiaircraft myself. They brought with them maps showing all the defenses of the city of Washington and the District of Columbia, and pointed out to me every single emplacement, guns of every type, searchlights, observation posts, and all of those things that go into antiaircraft defense. Let me say just in a general way that there is a regular scheme for aircraft defense in any area. It involves a series of concentric, irregular circles around the area to be defended. The outermost circle is one of observation posts. These observation posts are placed approximately 25 to 30 miles out. The city of Washington and the District of Columbia is ringed with these observation posts, well out into the States of Virginia and Maryland. Then the next circle is one of searchlights, placed again in such an arrangement that planes coming in from any direction could be picked up well out of the area where the bombs may be released. The next ring is one of heavy guns, what we call antiaircraft guns. We have different types in this country. Then inside of that are circles of smaller guns. Formerly we used machine guns in that innermost circle, or for those innermost emplacements. In fact, a few years ago we used .30-caliber machine guns, and then we developed .50-caliber machine guns for such areas. That gun was used until about a year ago, when we developed the presently used Bofors gun, which you have seen about the city of Washington and in various areas. When these Bofors guns became available, they replaced the .50-caliber machine guns which had been placed on various Government buildings, the House Office Building, and the Senate Office Building, and various other buildings downtown. They probably would have been placed on these same buildings except for two reasons: First, their range is greater, and therefore they can be placed farther away from the immediate target; second, they are very much heavier guns, and these roof supports are not sufficient for these guns. You will remember that one was placed in the House parking lot for several months. You can see them down along the Potomac River and in various places throughout the city of Washington.

I went over that map this morning. It shows these gun emplacements, and without divulging any secrets, I want to say to you that this area is adequately defended against air attack. It has all the observation posts reaching well out. It has the searchlights properly placed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. It has the most modern antiaircraft guns to be found anywhere—heavy guns—on that next circle. It has these very efficient Bofors guns I have told you about properly placed. In brief a curtain of exploding shells can be thrown up so as to be virtually impenetrable.

In an open area such as the District of Columbia, the machine gun is no longer deemed proper as a primary weapon for antiaircraft uses, but is used for the purpose of defending gun emplacements and the personnel against low flying planes that might attack them with machine guns.

However, when those places were vacated it was felt that it was the proper thing to do to place dummy guns there rather than to move out altogether, and that is the explanation as to the dummy gun emplacements.

I do want to assure you that the city of Washington and the District of Columbia is adequately defended against air attacks.

Mr. VINCENT of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. VINCENT of Kentucky. Personally I am not afraid to be in the House Office Building without any protection, but the gentleman is a member of the Military Affairs Committee.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. VINCENT of Kentucky. Did you know that dummy guns were there until yesterday?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No, I did not. As a matter of fact, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY] asked me what size gun it was over there, and I told him at that time it was a .50-caliber gun, because originally there were that size guns up there. Until these Bofors guns became available we had .50-caliber machine guns up there.

Mr. VINCENT of Kentucky. Are the same kind of dummy guns on the Senate Office Building?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The same kind of dummy guns are on the Senate Office Building.

Mr. VINCENT of Kentucky. And on the Department of Labor Building?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Now let us not go further into that. I said to you that when the Bofors guns came in the replacements were made. Why should we give away any dummy-gun stations that we have at all? It is not a matter of good defense to be telling where we have dummy guns. I have told you that these men who are charged with the defense of the city of Washington have shown me their maps, and I say to you that we are adequately defended.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Do you not think it is far more important that we worry about what is hanging over the heads of our soldiers than what is hanging over our own heads?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; I certainly do.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Do you know whether those guns are up there to reassure Congressmen of their own safety?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; they are not there for that purpose at all. Originally we had .50-caliber machine guns, and when they were replaced by the bigger, better, and more modern guns, the dummies were simply left there for any deceptive effect that they might have.

Mr. HARRIS of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS of Virginia. Does the gentleman share the apprehension of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY], who is an expert at duck hunting, that those guns would serve as decoys to bring bombs down on the Congressmen's heads?

Mr. SPARKMAN. None whatsoever.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. BARRETT].

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to hear the last speaker assure us that the District of Columbia is adequately prepared for defense, but I think we might well go back to the subject under discussion and consider whether the District of Columbia and the people therein are going to be fed, which is also a very important item.

Mr. Chairman, after Pearl Harbor, we found that from a military standpoint we were unprepared for war. The immediate response of our boys and of American labor and American industry astounded the world. It has been well said that production will win the war. It was self-evident that we sorely needed men, tanks, guns, planes, and ships, and now the stark truth has dawned upon us that we are in desperate need of fuel, food, and fiber. The health and vitality of our fighting men and our men behind the guns in industry are dependent upon an adequate food supply. For the first time in the history of our Nation we are faced with a critical food and fiber shortage. I am fearful, Mr. Chairman, that the shortages now apparent are insignificant with those which lie ahead. I sometimes shudder to think what would happen to America should we experience another drought similar to 1934. In this hour of peril the Nation is indeed fortunate to have available our irrigation resources of the West. The 16 Western States depend upon irrigated land for more than 70 percent of their food output. We in the West are agriculturists and irrigationists, and we are dead willing to do our part. The established agricultural production in western States must be protected and expanded. We have the plant, we can do the job if but given the necessary manpower, machinery, repairs, and equitable prices.

I am wholly in favor of this bill to control speculation in lands within Federal irrigation projects. It is a protection both to the Government and to the settler. It has long been accepted as a basic reclamation policy. The land is practically worthless without water. It is a wise provision to prevent speculation and gives the settler a chance to produce and live, and a measure of economic security.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. BARRETT] has expired.

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. PHILLIPS].

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary for those of us who live in the far western part of the United States to tell Members of this House that we sometimes farm under different methods than those of the East or the North or the South, but sometimes it is necessary to remind them of that fact. Sometimes it is necessary even to remind the Department of Agriculture.

A few days ago there was distributed in my area a very interesting and informative circular, mimeographed, from the Department, telling us how to take care of silk umbrellas in wartime. The farmers of that area do not, as a rule, get their water for the land from sources which make silk umbrellas necessary. We get it by conserving the water in the run-offs in the watersheds. We get it by reclamation projects such as this one before us today.

This bill goes only to details in which every Member of the House, whatever his opinion may be upon the subject of reclamation projects, can very well agree. This is a bill which merits the support of every one of us.

As to the need of this land, I merely lay before you the fact that even in an agricultural country the program of agriculture is not yet entirely coordinated. We are spending great sums of money to bring out of the schools boys and girls trained for the basic occupation of the United States, which is agriculture, and yet we are not always providing them with well-located and adequate lands for them to use after they are trained. We need food. We have been in the United States, recipients, inconsiderate recipients, of several years of excellent farming conditions. They cannot go on. We are expected to feed the world. We shall need every bit of land that can be put into production.

This bill deals with certain details of the development of the Columbia Basin project but concerning these details I think there can be no objection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one or two further questions?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does this 5-year limitation as to restrictive marketing apply on the land that is unsold as well as the land that may be sold to settlers?

Mr. PHILLIPS. That is my understanding. I ask the gentleman from Washington if that is correct.

Mr. HORAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In other words, after the first 5 years, the Government can sell this land at a much higher price.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ROCKWELL. I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I submit that question to the gentleman from Washington. Is my understanding of that correct?

Mr. HORAN. It is correct.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then, after the 5 years expires, the whole thing is open.

Mr. PHILLIPS. That is correct.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Whether it has been sold to settlers or not.

Mr. PHILLIPS. As I understand it, that is correct. I may say to the gentleman from Michigan for his information that the speculative periods in irrigation districts are right at the start, and in times of distress.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I understand. I have been all over the Rocky Mountains looking for suitable sites to put dams with which to concentrate water.

Mr. PHILLIPS. There are lots of places.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Another question is this: When this land is offered for sale to the settlers, are all the improvements on it—all the irrigation ditches—is everything in complete running order, or will he have to make an investment over and above the $85 or $90 per acre?

Mr. PHILLIPS. I should hazard a guess that he would have to make an investment himself. That is what usually happens in these irrigation districts. How much of an investment he would have to make, I am unable to answer.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That was not considered by the committee?

Mr. PHILLIPS. That was not considered in discussing this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS].

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, I just want to submit two observations in support of this bill. The first is this: The bill is devised to see that this project is devoted to the development of the family-sized farm, which, after all, is the basic unit in American democracy.

The second observation I want to make is that if there is one thing we could do now that would be most important as a means of preparation for the men who come back from winning this war it is this sort of thing. There is nothing I know of that is more constructive than for a man to come back from the war knowing there is a place where he can take a fresh start, where he can get a piece of land properly watered somewhere in this Nation, preferably in the West, where he can settle down and really have an opportunity to begin his life with hope again.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California yields back 1 minute.

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, I feel that this bill is properly safeguarded and does provide those things that we desire in an irrigation project. The bill should pass.

When it was first presented to the committee, the bill on page 12, line 20, had these words, "providing for the general welfare." These words were rather offensive to several members of the committee because they cover a multitude of sins and provide for social gains and objectives that were not practical in an irrigation bill. The committee struck out the words "providing for the general welfare."

The thing I am concerned about in some of these bills is that the Federal Government may adopt entirely too much control over individuals who settle upon the land. May I say, in governmental control, that most of us should feel that regimentation and planned economy which we have been experiencing is not compatible with the freedom and justice and the liberties which we enjoy in a democracy. Our Government should be merely an umpire guaranteeing a fair play, but the race and the development of this land should be left entirely to individuals. They should reap the rewards or suffer the losses and not the Government.

This bill does not require an appropriation. The bill removes the speculation from the development in this Grand Coulee irrigation project. It will make it possible for some 20,000 farm owners to live on the soil and develop their property.

Certainly our material resources, particularly the water, should be utilized to the best advantage. It is interesting when you talk about flood control, irrigation, and power. The individual who wants flood control must have an empty reservoir so he can take care of the floods when they come. The individual who desires irrigation must have a full reservoir in order to have water to put upon the land. Along with the development of dams and irrigation is that of power. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] was worrying about the power. Surely he realizes that with 20,000 new farm homes in this area that electricity will be needed in these homes and that the surplus energy of the Coulee Dam will have an outlet.

I hope that future administrations, be they Democratic or Republican, will not adopt a program of scarcity as we have done in the past. In the past little pigs have been killed and crops plowed under. There has never been an abundance of food; there has merely been a shortage of money to buy the food.

In my State, Nebraska, we have several irrigation projects. It is possible to bring an additional 600,000 acres under irrigation in Nebraska. We have adopted the policy in our State that not a single drop of water should leave the State until it is first utilized on our land and again for the production of power, if possible. The future must see intensive farming. Irrigation is the answer. This bill, which gives the opportunity, after the war is over, for the development of more land for irrigation should have the approval of this House.

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURRAY].

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that our colleague from California [Mr. VOORHIS] talked before me because he made the point I wanted to make. Since I have been here this is the first indication I have seen that we are beginning to figure out what our agricultural objective is. It is the family-sized farm. That is one criticism we could have made of our present agricultural program. That is, we did not have the most desirable agricultural objective in this respect.

I am not going to stand here and say that any man should have only so many acres of land. I do say that from a governmental Federal policy we should have an agricultural objective. That objective should be a farm the size a man and his family can operate. If we are going to do any subsidizing, we should at least subsidize according to what we believe in, and subsidize only the man who owns and operates and lives on his own farm.

I also wish to call your attention to the fact that when you irrigate this semi-arid land you are benefiting not only the people who live on the irrigated land. I do not know of any better example than North Dakota, which is represented so well by our good friends the gentlemen from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK and Mr. LEMKE]. If they have small areas of irrigated land, it would give those people some of the greatest social and farm security they could ever have. If they had a small area of irrigated land they would be assured of a crop every year on that land, and this would enhance very materially the value of all the rest of the land adjacent to the irrigated section. They can make much better and safer use of the surrounding nonirrigated land.

Many arguments could be advanced here as to whether we should irrigate any land. I realize that the 1,200,000 acres we are going to put into cultivation under this bill at some future time is a small part of the 341,000,000 acres of crop land in the United States. I also realize it is somewhat confusing to spend as much money on irrigation as we did in previous years and then turn around and spend millions of dollars for not producing crops. This is especially true when we have imported competitive agricultural products in value equal to 10 percent of our national farm income.

I think that as far as the future welfare of this country is concerned the people in the Midwest and all over the United States in the years to come must assume a rather realistic approach to the problem of irrigation.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to oppose this measure. I have been one of the most enthusiastic supporters of the development of the Columbia River. My main object has been to give the American people electricity at what it is worth. The Almighty has "mysterious ways his wonders to perform."

In the Tennessee Valley our surplus or secondary power, which is floodwater power, comes in the wintertime when we have our heavy rains and when we need it for heating purposes. On the Columbia River it comes in the summertime, from melting snow and ice. The summertime is when they need this extra power to pump the water for irrigation purposes.

I am not opposed to giving those farmers this power at cost, but I do not want to see the Bureau of Reclamation subsidize irrigated areas east of the Cascade Mountains at the expense of the power consumers west of the Cascade Mountains. I am willing for the Government to provide those farmers with this water, or with the power to pump this water, at what it actually costs, but I do not want to burden the power consumers of the rest of the area with exorbitant rates in order to do so.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. WHITE. The gentleman would not oppose the people who pump this water being granted a rate of 2 mills per kilowatt-hour?

Mr. RANKIN. That power can be produced at Grand Coulee at 2 mills per kilowatt-hour or less, and, as I said, I would like to give it to them at cost.

Mr. WHITE. It is the program of the Bureau of Reclamation to furnish power to pump this water at the rate of 2 mills per kilowatt-hour.

Mr. RANKIN. That is all right, and I am for that.

Some time ago I was on the Columbia River. I visited the Bonneville Dam and was thrilled to contemplate what the distribution of that power at the proper rates would mean to the people of that great northwestern country, not only now but for centuries to come.

I have labored for years for the building of both the Grand Coulee and Bonneville Dams. I knew what the Tennessee Valley Authority had meant to the people of our section of the country.

If I had my way, the T. V. A. would not retail power to anybody but it would be sold through the municipalities and the cooperative power associations. In that way we would avoid the criticism, or the charge, of selling too much power to any monopoly or to any one concern. I would apply the same rule on the Columbia River.

Mr. CASE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE. The gentleman said that he would sell it to the municipalities and the cooperative power associations. Does he mean by that he would not sell it to private owners?

Mr. RANKIN. I would sell it to private companies provided they would sign an agreement to distribute power to all their customers at the same rates the municipality or the cooperative association were permitted to charge—the yardstick rates.

What I am after is getting electricity to every human being in America, to every home, to every business establishment, to every farm in America at the very lowest rates it can be produced and distributed without loss on legitimate necessary investments.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. I wish to express my appreciation of the work of the gentleman from Mississippi all these years in furnishing abundant and cheap electric power to the farmers of America. I regard the gentleman as a man with a vision, as coauthor of the T. V. A., and an effective supporter of similar great projects. Also I assure the gentleman that this proposition before us develops the whole program of reclamation and irrigation in the Columbia River Basin in a logical manner, so that no true subsidizing is done for power producer or farmer, for each pays his own share of the cost.

Mr. RANKIN. That is fine; that is the policy I want pursued.

I call attention to the fact that Grand Coulee is the largest power dam on earth. It will supply about eighteen or twenty billion kilowatt-hours of electricity each year. The power generated at Grand Coulee every 24 hours will exceed the combined physical strength of every man living west of the Mississippi River working 8 hours a day.

I want to see this power distributed at the lowest possible rate to ultimately return to the Government the money invested, even if it takes 50 years. And my first concern is to see that this power is distributed to the farmers at those rates.

Today every other country in the world is running ahead of us on rural electrification and the development of waterpower. Since Japan began this war against China I am told that Japan has built a dam in Manchukuo bigger than any dam in America, with the exception of Boulder Dam and Grand Coulee. I pointed out the other day that the Aluminum Co. of Canada has a contract with the United States and Great Britain and is now completing a dam in northern Quebec, as big as Boulder Dam. They are fighting today over the Dneprostroy Dam in Russia. When that dam was constructed it was the biggest one in the world. I believe it was built by Colonel Cooper, the same engineer who built the Wilson Dam, on the Tennessee River.

The people of Europe 8 years ago had 90 percent of their farms electrified, in Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Germany, Italy, and France, and in Switzerland and Holland they had 100 percent of their farms electrified. Eight years ago Japan had 90 percent of her farms electrified. When I first brought those facts out several years ago, some Member arose and said that those were socialized countries, where the populations were dense. But I pointed out that even at that time New Zealand, far away, sparsely settled New Zealand, where the farms are few and far between, had 65 percent of her farms electrified, while at that time America, the richest country in all the world had only 10 percent of her farms electrified, and as a rule those were suburban farms, owned by men living just outside of a municipality. I have tried all these years not only to have these dams built, but to develop the water power of the entire Nation, and also to distribute it at rates the people could afford to pay.

Last week I put into the RECORD the rates for 1941, showing overcharges in every State in the Union in 1941, which amounted, all told, to more than $1,000,000,000 a year.

In 1941 we used 139,000,000,000 kilowatts of electricity in this country. There are 230,000,000,000 kilowatts of annual production going to waste in our navigable streams and their tributaries, a wealth richer than the diamond mines of Golconda; more valuable than all the oil wells, gold mines, or diamond mines that the world has ever seen; yet when we offer a bill to try to develop that power in order to benefit all the American people and to leave something for the generations to come, to light their homes, lighten their burdens, and make their living conditions more pleasant and more attractive, we run up against the opposition that seems to be inspired by certain selfish interests all over the Nation.

I wish we could develop all the water power of this country, and I have introduced a bill for that purpose.

I congratulate the people of the Columbia River area on this great development. It marks the dawning of a new day for the Pacific Northwest.

It reminds us of the immortal lines of Bishop Berkeley concerning progress in America which were written 200 years ago:

Westward the course of empire takes its way;
The four first acts already past,
A fifth shall close the drama with the day;
Time's noblest offspring is the last.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. NORMAN].

Mr. NORMAN. Mr. Chairman, in commenting briefly on H. R. 839 I want to emphasize that the people of the State of Washington are unanimously behind this bill. The people of the State, through their legislature and the taxpayers, put up all the money for the preliminary work leading up to the construction of the Grand Coulee Dam.

I had the privilege of being a member of the State Senate of Washington for 11 sessions, covering a period of about 16 years, during which time the Grand Coulee project was promoted, started, and completed. In 1919 the State of Washington voted $100,000 for the first survey for the Columbia Basin project. Each succeeding session they voted from $50,000 to $100,000 to carry on the work of the Columbia Basin Commission, which hired engineers, made borings and various surveys, which eventually resulted in the construction of the project by the Federal Government. The taxpayers of the State of Washington cheerfully put up this money. They do not desire, and are not attempting by this bill, to get any reimbursement for that at all, but they have brought this project, through their preliminary work and the lending of the credit of the Federal Government for the construction of the work, up to the point where they can now build up an area of about 20,000 new farms, which will be a protection to this country against another food crisis, similar to the one we are passing through now.

I respectfully urge the House to pass this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK].

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I was assigned to make sure that no part of this argument was left out.

I want to compliment the new Members of this Congress who have spoken on this bill. They not only have spoken well, but they spoke fully about the facts before us.

The time has gone by when we consider whether it is a good or a bad thing for irrigation. That was done in 1937, when this law was passed. We had an extended argument on the necessity of irrigation. That does not apply now, because all we are trying to do in this bill is to amend the act of 1937. We have found that, while in the act of 1937 we tried to prevent speculation, we did not prevent it. Here are the reasons we did not prevent it. Our law was not specific enough. There are one or two things that we have to remedy, and that is all we are here for. It is to remedy that bill of 1937.

We provide now that instead of having 40 acres of land, any owner can have 160 acres under this bill. The reason we want to increase it is that if limited to 40 acres a great number of owners would not come in at all. They did not come in. It is thought now that by increasing the number of acres they will all come in because anyone who has ever lived in the West, who has ever irrigated land there, knows that 160 acres is a lot of land.

The second fault with the old bill was that the Secretary of the Interior could forecast the value of the land after the water was on it. Instead of fixing the value of the land under existing conditions he was authorized to figure ahead on something that was not yet in existence; in other words "increment values." Now that has been changed and the values of the present existing situation are taken into consideration.

The one thing that appeals to me as the most valuable in this bill is that while we ask for no appropriation for this huge project of over a million acres, and it will not be put into operation probably for the next 20 years, it is planned economy for this country, following this Second World War. Those of us who were here in this Congress 7 or 8 years ago remember that there were 15,000,000 men out of work in this country, and it was necessary for this Government to furnish work for them. I do not think there was anybody in the Congress at that time who wanted private industry to suspend and let the Government do the work, but private industry had failed, and the Congress stepped in to furnish the jobs. Now, when this war is over we want to make sure there are jobs for those boys who are returning from the Second World War. I hope that private industry will furnish those jobs, but whether it does or whether it does not, those jobs will be furnished, and the conservative Members of this Congress may be confronted with what we were all confronted with in 1933, 1934, and 1935; that is, to furnish jobs.

It seems to me this bill is a step in the right direction. Twenty thousand families will find homes and a place to work and the money expended by the Government will be paid back. As proof of this I cite the cost of the Grand Coulee Dam to date of $160,000,000, on which the Government is now receiving an annual income of $12,000,000. When this Congress can plan an enterprise that is self-liquidating, and at the same time avoid the expenditure of millions in direct relief, there should be no valid argument against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, it is my information that all time on the other side has been consumed. We have no more speakers on this side. I ask that the bill be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill be dispensed with, the bill to be printed in the RECORD and considered as read. I may state that the bill sets forth a number of paragraphs that were in the previous bill. It is a technical bill and in order fully to understand it one would really have to compare this bill with the previous one.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman couple with his request a further request that any part of the bill is to be considered open to amendment?

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I modify my request to meet the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered as read, be printed in the RECORD at this point, and to be subject to amendment at any part. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of May 27, 1937 (ch. 269, 50 Stat. 208), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. In addition to the primary purposes for which the Grand Coulee Dam project (hereafter to be known as the Columbia Basin project and herein called the project) was authorized under the provisions of the act of August 30, 1935 (49 Stat. 1028), the project is hereby authorized and reauthorized as a project subject to the Reclamation Project Act of 1939; and the provisions of each of those two acts together with the provisions of this act shall govern the repayment of expenditures and the construction, operation, and maintenance of the works constructed as a part of the project.

"SEC. 2. (a) No part of the funds heretofore or hereafter appropriated or allotted for project construction or for the reclamation of land within the project shall be expended in the construction of any irrigation features of the project, exclusive of Grand Coulee Dam and appurtenant works now under construction and of the pumping plant and equalizing reservoir and dams, until the requirements of the following subdivisions (i) and (ii) of this subsection (a) have been met:

"(i) All lands within the project shall have been impartially appraised by the Secretary of the Interior (hereinafter called the Secretary) and evaluated at the date of appraisal without reference to or increment on account of the construction of the project. Reappraisals may be made at any time by the Secretary, and will be made upon the request of the landowner concerned accompanied by an advance to the United States of $15 for each quarter section or fraction thereof involved, on account of expense thereof. In such reappraisals the Secretary shall take into account, in addition to the value found in the first appraisal, improvements made after said appraisal, such irrigation construction charges on the land as have been paid, and other items of value that are proper, other than increments on account of the construction of the project. The term 'appraised value' as used in this act shall mean appraised values determined as provided in this subsection.

"(ii) Contracts shall have been made with irrigation, reclamation, or conservancy districts organized under State law embracing the lands within the project providing for payment thereby of that part of the cost of construction of the project determined by the Secretary to be the part thereof to be repaid by irrigation. Each such contract shall conform to the requirements of this act, shall require repayment within the maximum period permitted under the act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stat. 388), and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto (hereinafter called the Federal reclamation laws), and provide that payments shall be enforceable by all means and remedies provided in said laws.

"(b) (i) The lands within the project shall be developed in irrigation blocks, as that term is defined in the Reclamation Project Act of 1939. The Secretary shall segregate the lands in each irrigation block into farm units of sufficient acreage for the support of an average-sized family at a suitable living level, having in mind the character of soil, topography, location with respect to the irrigation system, and such other relevant factors as, in his judgment, enter into the determination of the area and boundaries thereof; and shall establish the units as hereafter provided. No farm unit shall contain more than 160 or less than 10 acres of irrigable land, except that any nominal quarter section comprising more than 160 acres of irrigable land may be included in 1 farm unit, and except that lands owned by the United States may be established into units of lesser size for part-time farming purposes.

"(ii) Prior to the initial delivery of water to an irrigation block, the Secretary shall prepare a plat of all the farm units in the irrigation block and shall publish a notice of the intention to establish such farm unit plat in six weekly issues of a newspaper of general circulation in the county or counties in which any part of the irrigation block is located. From the date of first publication, a copy of the plat shall be available in the county auditor's office of each of said counties for public inspection during the business hours of the office. Any interested landowner shall have the right to file written objections to the plat with the county auditor of the county in which his lands are situated before the close of the period of publication. After expiration of the period of publication the Secretary shall consider and determine all such objections, draw the plat in final form, and file it for record in said county auditors' offices. With the consent of the owners of all farm units affected, the Secretary may revise the plat or any part thereof from time to time, and place the revisions of record with the original plat.

"(iii) Water shall not be delivered from, through, or by means of the project works to or for lands not conforming in area and boundaries to the farm units covering the lands involved, nor to or for more than one farm unit held by any one land owner, except that as to lands held by the one having equitable or legal title on May 27, 1937, or the heir or devisee of such owner, delivery may be made to or for a total irrigable area not exceeding the maximum provided in this section. The limitations of this subdivision shall not apply to lands owned by the United States or any agency or instrumentality thereof, corporate or otherwise.

"(iv) Lands within the project in excess of one farm unit held by any one landowner shall, except as otherwise provided in this act be deemed excess land: Provided, That if excess land is acquired by foreclosure or other process of law, by conveyance in satisfaction of mortgages, by inheritance or by devise, water therefor may be furnished temporarily for a period not exceeding 5 years from the effective date of such acquisition, delivery of water thereafter ceasing until the transfer thereof to a landowner duly qualified to secure water therefor.

"(v) As used in this act, the terms 'owner,' 'landowner,' and 'any one landowner,' denote any person, corporation, joint-stock association or family; the term 'family' denotes a group consisting of either or both husband and wife, together with their children under 18 years of age, or all of such children if both parents are dead; the term 'their children' includes the issue and lawfully adopted children of either or both husband and wife; and the term 'lands within the project' denotes those lands within the boundaries of the existing Columbia Basin irrigation districts, or revisions thereof approved by the Secretary, which the Secretary determines may be supplied water from, through, or by means of the project works and are required to be included to provide for sound development and operation of the project. Lands shall be deemed to be held by a family, if held as separate property of husband or wife, or constitute a part or all of their community property, or if they are the property of any or all of their children under 18 years of age.

"(c) As a condition precedent to receiving water from the project and in consideration thereof, each landowner shall be required to execute, within 6 months from the date of the execution of the contract between the United States and the district within which the land is located, a recordable contract covering all his lands within that district, agreeing as to such lands for and on behalf of himself, his heirs, successors, and assigns to the provisions set forth in this subsection (c): Provided, That any landowner, having failed to execute such a contract within this period, may be permitted to execute such contract within 1 year after the date of judicial confirmation of the validity of the contract between the United States and the district but only in accordance with such rules and regulations as may be prescribed under section 8 concerning this privilege.

"Each such recordable contract shall provide—

"(i) That the landowner will conform his lands by purchase, sale, or exchange at the appraised values to the area and boundaries of the pertinent farm unit or units shown on the plats filed under subsection 2 (b) and will dispose of excess land then or thereafter owned by him at its appraised value; that the Secretary is thereby given an irrevocable power of attorney to sell in behalf of the landowner any such excess land at said appraised value; and that the United States is thereby given, without further consideration, an option to buy any such excess land at said appraised value: Provided, That sales under such power or such option, unless otherwise provided in writing by said owner, shall be only for cash and only such that surrender of possession by the owner of any area of excess lands then operated as a single unit for dry farming or grazing may be effected substantially at one time.

"(ii) That in the period from the date of execution thereof and to a date 5 years from the time water becomes available for the lands covered thereby, no conveyance of or contract to convey a freehold estate in such lands, whether excess or nonexcess lands, shall be made for a consideration exceeding its appraised value, and in connection with any conveyance of, or contract to convey, such an estate within such period the grantor or vendor or the grantee or vendee or any lien holder thereof shall, within 30 days from the date of such conveyance or contract, file in the office of the county auditor in the county or counties in which the land is located an affidavit describing the conveyance or contract and the consideration therefor.

"(iii) That in the event that within such period such a conveyance of, or contract to convey, is made without filing within said 30 days the affidavit required in (ii) of this subsection, or is made for a consideration in excess of the appraised value, the Secretary, at any time within 2 years of the day on which there is filed for recording in the official county records the contract or deed involved, whichever is filed earliest in the event both the contract and deed are filed in a given transaction, may cancel the right of such estate to receive water from, through, or by means of the project works by a written notice of cancelation: Provided, That said power to cancel as to any given parcel of land may be waived by the Secretary at any time within said 2-year period by a written notice of waiver: And provided further, That after any such cancelation a project water right for the estate involved may be acquired only on terms and conditions satisfactory to the Secretary.

"(iv) That should any freehold estate in land covered thereby be conveyed or contracted to be conveyed within the period defined in (ii) of this subsection, the transaction, and any mortgage or other lien covering any deferred consideration thereunder, shall be subject to all the provisions of subsection 3 (b) hereof.

"Any or all of the provisions of this subsection (c) required to be included in the recordable contracts may be made covenants running with the land when said recordable contracts expressly so provide.

"(d) Each contract made pursuant to subdivision 2 (a) (ii) shall provide that no water will be delivered from, through, or by means of the project works except in accordance with the provisions and limitations of section 2 hereof.

"(e) Each district contract may include provisions—

"(i) Requiring that all lands within the district not covered by recordable contracts provided for under subsection (c) or otherwise not eligible to receive water shall be subject to assessment in the same manner and to the same extent as like lands eligible to receive water, subject to such provisions as the Secretary may prescribe for postponement in payment of all or part of such assessments but not beyond the expiration of the period during which the price limit under subsection 2 (c) applies.

"(ii) That, without compliance with other provisions of State law for the exclusion of lands, lands may be withdrawn from the district by filing a written notice of withdrawal with the district board on or before such date fixed by such board between a date 10 days after the official notice of the election on the contract between the United States and the district and the date of such election. The date limiting the time of such filing shall be announced in the official notice of the proposed election, and lands for which such notice is filed shall be deemed excluded from the district for all purposes as of the time of such filing. Thereafter lands so withdrawn and excluded so long as they remain in private ownership shall not be entitled to receive water from, through, or by means of the project works.

"(f) Any instrument, action, determination, rule, or regulation of the Secretary or his duly authorized representatives under the authority of this section 2 which is or may be determinative of the title to lands or interest in lands in private ownership within the project shall be effective as to any given parcel of land, as against purchasers for value without actual notice, only from the time of the filing for record in the office of the county auditor of the county or counties in which the lands affected are located of a copy thereof authenticated in the manner authorized by law. Such filing shall impart legal notice to the public of the matters and things set out therein.

"SEC. 3. (a) Fraudulent misrepresentation as to the true consideration involved in the conveyance of, or contract to convey, any freehold estate in land covered by a recordable contract made under subsection 2 (c) hereof, in the affidavit required by that subsection shall constitute a misdemeanor punishable by a fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment not exceeding 6 months, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

"(b) Should any freehold estate in lands subject to the recordable contract made under subsection 2 (c) hereof be conveyed or contracted to be conveyed after the date of execution of such recordable contract and within 5 years from the time water becomes available for such lands, at a consideration in excess of the appraised value of said estate, the transaction, and any mortgage or other lien covering any deferred consideration thereunder, shall be invalid and unenforceable by the vendor or grantor, his successors or assigns as to that part of the consideration in excess of the appraised value of the estate involved. In the case of any such transaction involving deferred payments, said invalid portion of the consideration shall be deducted first from the deferred payments in the inverse order of their due dates.

"The vendee or grantee in any such transaction, at any time within 2 years from the date of any such conveyance or contract and on filing a correct affidavit as required in subdivision 2 (c) (ii), may recover from the vendor or grantor, or the successors or assigns thereof, an amount equal to the payments made in excess of the appraised value.

"In connection with any judgment or decree hereunder in favor of a vendee or grantee, said vendee or grantee shall have the right to recover court costs and reasonable attorneys' fees.

"SEC. 4. (a) For the purposes of assisting in the permanent settlement of farm families, protecting project land, facilitating project development, preventing speculation in project lands, and providing for the general welfare, the Secretary is authorized to administer public lands of the United States in the project area and lands acquired under this section; to sell, exchange, or lease such lands; to establish town sites on such lands; to dedicate portions of such lands for public purposes in keeping with sound project development; to acquire in the name of the United States, at prices satisfactory to him, such lands or interest in lands, within or adjacent to the project area, as he deems appropriate for the protection, development, or improvement of the project; to accept donations of real and personal property for the purposes of this act; and to disseminate information by appropriate means and methods. Any moneys realized on account of donations for purposes of this act shall be covered into the Treasury as trust funds.

"(b) Contracts, exchanges, and leases made under this section shall be on terms that, in the Secretary's judgment, are in keeping with sound project development. In addition, land-sale contracts shall be on a basis that, in the Secretary's judgment, provides for the return in a reasonable period of years of not less than the appraised value of the land and improvements thereon.

"Qualifications of applicants for the purchase of land for irrigation farming shall be prescribed as provided in subsection C of section 4 of the act of December 5, 1924 (43 Stat. 702), notwithstanding any other provisions of law.

"SEC. 5. (a) The Secretary may enter into agreements to pay annual sums in lieu of taxes or assessments to any State or political subdivision thereof or irrigation, reclamation, or conservancy district with respect to any real property situated therein after it is acquired pursuant to the authority of this act and before execution by the United States of a contract of sale covering it, out of funds derived from the leasing of such lands. The amount so paid for any year upon any such property shall not exceed the taxes or assessments that would be paid to the State or subdivision, as the case may be, upon such property if it were not exempt from taxation thereby.

"(b) Any public lands and any lands or interests in lands acquired by the United States under the provisions of this act and included in farm unit plats filed by the Secretary under subdivision 2 (b) (ii) and offered for sale shall be subject to all provisions of the laws of the State of Washington relating to the organization, government, and regulation of irrigation, reclamation, and conservancy districts and shall be subject to liens for charges legally assessed by any such district, to the same extent and in substantially the same manner as public lands subject to entry are or may be subject to said laws and charges by the provisions of sections 1, 2, 3, 5, and 7 of the act of August 11, 1916 (39 Stat. 506), as amended by the act of May 15, 1922 (42 Stat. 541).

"(c) Upon execution by the United States of a contract of sale of any lands within the project, the lands under contract may be taxed by the State or political subdivision thereof in the same manner and to the same extent as privately owned lands of a like character. All taxes legally so assessed may be enforced by the sale of the lands in the same manner and under the same proceeding whereby said taxes are enforced against privately owned lands: Provided, That the title or interest which the State or political subdivision thereof may convey in any tax proceeding shall be subject to whatever title remains in the United States and to any prior lien reserved to the United States for all unpaid installments upon the contract of sale, whether accrued or otherwise, and any other charges upon said land which have accrued or may accrue under and by virtue of said contract of sale or the contract between the United States and the district in which the land is located.

"SEC. 6. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such moneys as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act, to be reimbursable to the extent required by this act. All revenues received in carrying out the provisions of section 4 hereof shall be covered into the General Treasury as 'miscellaneous receipts.' Amounts equal to appropriated funds requisitioned by the Secretary and made available for disbursement on the books of the Treasurer of the United States shall be debited in a special account in the Treasury, to be known as the Columbia Basin land-development account. Amounts equal to revenues covered into the General Treasury, as 'miscellaneous receipts' shall be credited in said special account. After such credits equal the amount of the debits with interest thereon at the rate of 3 percent per annum from the respective dates of the debits, additional credits in said special account shall be made by the Secretary, in the manner determined by him, the basis of corresponding credits to the construction cost obligations of the district or districts entering into contracts under section 2 hereof.

"SEC. 7. No water shall be delivered for irrigation within the project until the State of Washington, by appropriate legislation, shall have adopted, authorized, ratified, and consented to all the provisions of this act insofar as such provisions or any of them, in whole or in part, may come within the scope of State jurisdiction or authority or be applicable to State lands.

"Legislation otherwise conforming to the standards above stated in this section will meet the requirements of the section even though, by reason of limitations in the State constitution, the contracts required under subsection 2 (c) cannot be executed pursuant to such legislation as to the State's school and other public lands. As to such lands, the provisions and requirements of subsection 2 (c) shall remain effective, but if these constitutional limitations have not been removed at least 6 months prior to the expiration of the time provided for the execution of the contracts the time is hereby extended for a period ending 6 months after the removal of the limitations.

"SEC. 8. The Secretary is authorized to perform such acts, to make such rules and regulations, and to include in the contracts hereinbefore provided for such provisions as he deems proper for carrying out the provisions of this act; and in connection with sales or exchanges under the act, he is authorized to effect conveyances without regard to the law governing the patenting of public lands. Wherever in this act functions, powers, or duties are conferred upon the Secretary, said functions, powers, or duties may be performed, exercised, or discharged by his duly authorized representatives.

"SEC. 9. The consent of the United States is hereby given to the sale of school lands and any other public lands of the State of Washington comprising a part of the lands within the project at prices not to exceed their appraised values, determined as provided in subsection 2 (a) hereof.

"SEC. 10. If any provision of this act or the application of such provision to any person or circumstances shall be held invalid, the remainder of the act and the application of such provision to persons or circumstances other than those as to which it is held invalid shall not be affected thereby.

"SEC. 11. This act may be cited as 'The Columbia Basin Project Act.'"

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendments: On page 12, line 19, after the word "developed", insert the word "and." On page 12, line 20, strike out the words "and providing for the general welfare."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, stripped of its trimmings, this is just one more paternalistic measure, and, as is the nature of all political paternalism, destructive of free enterprise and liberty.

Like the other paternalistic proposals that come before legislative bodies for consideration, this one comes gilded with a great humanitarian principle, concern for the welfare of honest people, those who truly earn their living by the sweat of their brows, and the promise that the supreme political authority will protect them against the wiles and cunning of speculators, bad people, who would live off the toil of others.

But this humanitarian concern and protection is to last for only 5 years.

As though speculation would cease after the initial interests that are involved in the project would be taken care of. I suppose the theory is that after living on, or owning, the land for 5 years this does something to make one immune against speculation.

Like every other paternalistic measure, this one involves further extension of political price fixing of farm commodities, for surely the supreme political authority cannot place a value on this land without concerning itself, sooner or later, not only with prices the farmers on this irrigated land receive, as well as all farm prices, but the prices of all services, for all prices are part of one process.

I understand provision is made in this bill for the Federal Government to lay out town plots on the project. This is to be a politically planned project all the way through. The National Resources Planning Board and one or more of the Federal housing agencies will be there to plan the towns, build the houses, and regulate the living conditions of the community.

Totalitarianism marches on.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, some folks might think that with the hundreds of thousands or perhaps millions of acres of fertile land in this country going uncultivated because of lack of farm machinery and labor it was unnecessary to irrigate land to grow crops; but be that as it may—and I shall not oppose this bill—we should not forget that we are not going to grow crops, we are not going to grow anything on this additional land brought under irrigation nor other land unless you get the labor to plant, cultivate, and harvest the crops. The morning paper carries the statement that the Secretary of Agriculture has suspended the restrictive orders which prevented the marketing of wheat except under penalty. That is one step in the right direction, but there are many other restrictive orders the New Deal has put in force that are now in effect, that will have to be rescinded before we will be able to feed the civilian population or any armed force. In time of stress regimentation has been shown to be worse than a failure. It is a positive drag on production.

The papers also carry the news that the President has ordered the armed forces to pick cotton in the West. Well, now, if this administration thinks that it can grow crops, that it can produce beef, pork, butter, eggs, or milk under the administration of the Army it has another think coming. The way to produce food is to permit the experts—the farmers who have been doing the job—to continue to do it.

Until this Congress comes to the relief of the farmer and permits him to carry on his work in the old-fashioned, independent way, we are just at a standstill.

The first thing for this Congress to do, in my judgment, at least, is to get back on the land the men who know how to cultivate it and who, either because of higher wages, patriotism, or the draft, have been taken from the farm. They are exempting men all over who are in industry. Some of them are skilled mechanics and some are not, but if they happen to be in a factory, no matter what their age, no matter what their fitness for the armed forces, many of those men are exempt.

The country is now aware, as Congress is aware and as the unions themselves are aware, that absenteeism is hindering production not only here and there but all over, yet some of those who are guilty of that practice are exempt from service. On the other hand, they take the farm boy, the only man—I say that advisedly—who can grow the food the armed forces and the civilian population need. You take him off the farm and put him in the armed forces, and the land lies idle.

I speak of that because last week, being home, and living in an agricultural county, I took that question up with a member of the draft board. The only answer they could give, and it was the only answer, was, "Our folks are farmers. When the administration calls for so many men, we haven't anyone else to take except the men off the farms." So you see what is happening to us throughout our county, and I know it is the same in other counties and districts and in other States. We are stripping the farms, and we all know it. Unless we put through this Congress soon some legislation which gives the farmers some relief, it is just idle to put other land under the plow or into cultivation in irrigated districts.

The simple, effective remedy is to defer expert farm workers, to return to the farms men now in the Army who know farm production in sufficient number, to produce the food which we must have.

The President's plan of sending a company of soldiers to pick the cotton crop in the West may get that particular product harvested. But there is nothing new about it. Perhaps he got the idea from another Roosevelt—Clinton Roosevelt, who, in 1841, published a book entitled "The Science of Government." Permit me to quote from that book. That Roosevelt wrote:

> Where large numbers might congregate, they should labor together under leaders in the fields and in factories under foremen and officers, precisely as soldiers in an Army do.

The idea may be all right as a theory, but it will not work in practice. It will not produce food. Farming is a year-around job. It is a job that requires brains, knowledge, experience, as well as a strong back.

A company or a regiment from the Army might have in it some expert farmers, but where will you find a regiment where more than 50 percent are fitted to, in one instance, plant, cultivate, and harvest crops in the North; in another, carry on farming operations in the South; or take over and manage a dairy?

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MOTT. If what the gentleman's local board told him is correct, it is contrary to the instructions issued by the Director of the Selective Service System to these boards. I believe the regulation is called regulation No. 19, although I am not sure I can recall the number offhand. They state the policy, which is supposed to be a new one, that persons engaged in the production of essential food shall be considered for deferment by the draft boards.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I know that. They may be considered but they are not as a rule given deferment or exemption.

Mr. MOTT. If they do not do it, they are going against the instructions issued by the Director.

Mr. HOFFMAN. But you have to have so many units, some for this, that, and the other, to put the regulation in force. The farmers go to the county agent, but the units do not add up to quite enough, and the boy goes into the Army just the same and the land is not cultivated.

Mr. DONDERO. That order came too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I merely rise to add my endorsement to the pending legislation. I hope it will pass the House with due dispatch. We have come to a point now in my State, as my colleague from that section knows, where a bill of this sort is essential.

Many of you older members of the House will recall the fight we had here for many years to develop what we called our public power resources in the West. Many of you stood up at the time we were seeking appropriations for Grand Coulee Dam and other projects and asked what we were going to do with the power. It now turns out that the need for power is far beyond the ideas of any of us at that time. If we had built five Grand Coulee dams, we would still not have enough power for the war effort and for the industries in the Pacific Northwest. So this is merely building a roof on the house this Congress has built over a period of years on our public-power program.

I do hope there will be little or no opposition to this bill. It means that we can develop that section now as it should be developed and let it be an outlet for those who want to go into the great West to make their living.

Mr. Chairman, while I am on my feet I think it is appropriate at this time to speak about something else that is happening in the West.

Three years ago one of our fellow Members, the Republican Representative from California, JACK ANDERSON, presented an idea which at that time fell on deaf ears. Today, in a factory in Salinas, Calif., the wisdom of his foresight is being proven, for there the United States is at this moment producing its first batch of natural rubber from a scrawny-looking shrub called guayule. It is only 600 tons—small in comparison to our national emergency rubber needs—but a step which might well point the way to the opening of a vast rubber producing area in our Southwest.

It was almost 2 years before the bombing of Pearl Harbor that the gentleman from California [Mr. ANDERSON] first presented his idea to Congress. He told us then that it would be good business for the United States to grow rubber, especially with the possibility of a war in the Pacific shutting off the supply from the East Indies.

In the following months he actually traveled from door to door of the Federal agencies trying to interest them in his idea. The strange looking plant he carried with him as exhibit A aroused passing interest and was then forgotten. He was given endless reasons why the United States should not produce rubber domestically — international relations, appropriations, the unproven qualities of guayule.

But so deep-rooted was his faith in his idea and in the necessity for this country to develop its own rubber resources that he was not discouraged in his efforts. Time after time he suggested in behalf of the House the necessity of providing domestic rubber for national defense purposes and introduced a bill providing for the cultivation of guayule.

While waiting for it to be brought up for a committee hearing he started his rounds again from door to door of the Government agencies. It was not until March 5, 1942, that a bill providing for a guayule program was finally signed by the President.

This is the same plant which the Baruch committee described in its report on the rubber situation as "the principal source of crude rubber which could not be lost to us short of conquest of American territory." The report went even further and recommended a program for its production be given support. But the Baruch committee—and all of us—were more than 2 years behind our colleague from California.

And so today, I would like to give honor where honor is due—even though it is to someone from the opposite side of the aisle. I would like to pay tribute to the undaunted spirit of persistence which the gentleman from California, JACK ANDERSON, displayed in his attempt to make the Nation guayule conscious. He might well be called the father of our emergency guayule program.

That is a small amount in percent of our national needs, but, as I say, I think this House ought to give flowers to the living, and ought to pay tribute to the gentleman from California, JACK ANDERSON, a Republican Member of this House, for his foresight, and I look for the day, if we pay attention to some of these ideas like the gentleman from California, JACK ANDERSON, had, particularly on guayule rubber, when we will never again have to depend upon any part of the world for our natural sources of rubber.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee will now rise.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GAVAGAN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 839, and, pursuant to House Resolution 109, reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en grosse. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that those who spoke on the bill may revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point and include an editorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to address a word or two to my Republican colleagues from New England. It is quite all right for you Members to support the construction of the Florida barge canal, when the measure providing for that job comes before the House, which I trust will be in the very near future.

The Providence Journal, the bible of Republicanism, has issued its pronunciamento. In an editorial on Sunday, February 21, it decided that it will accept the barge canal, in order that the people of New England will not have to freeze next winter in their homes, as they did during the past few months—in order that our schools, our industry, our stores, our retail and wholesale establishments will not have to close their doors, as they have been forced to do this winter.

I ask that you read this editorial carefully, and then screw your courage to the sticking point, and support the canal project, because New England needs oil, and this measure provides our best bet:

[From the Providence Sunday Journal of February 21, 1943]

OUR BEST BET

Oil-starved New England's Representatives in Congress should bend their efforts toward getting favorable action on the bill now pending in the House Ways and Means Committee appropriating $44,000,000 for the construction of the Florida barge canal as a practical way of helping assure a more adequate supply of fuel for this section next winter.

There is now complete and open to traffic an inland waterway from Corpus Christi, Tex., to the west coast of Florida. There is likewise complete an inland waterway from Jacksonville, on the east coast of Florida, north to Trenton, N. J.

All that is necessary to complete the route from the oil-field area to New Jersey is the barge canal across Florida, tying together the two existing waterways. Construction of the canal was authorized by vote of Congress last July. But beginning of work awaits the passage of the appropriation making funds available.

Responsible construction firms have given assurances that the canal can be completed and in operation within 10 months after work starts, and say there is ample equipment available to do the job. Thus, with a quick beginning, the waterway should be ready for use by next January.

With the canal in service, oil could be brought by barge from Texas to New Jersey and transshipped from there to New England and other northeastern points. Contracts have already been placed for some barges and all those needed can, it is said, be provided easily by the time the canal is ready. These vessels are of wood construction, quickly built, and capable of carrying either crude or heavy oils. They would be brought, in tows of three, over the water route by tugs.

The proposal—provided Congress will act upon it promptly—appears to offer this section its "best bet" for not having to go through next winter what is going through this winter in trying to get oil enough to keep its people from freezing and its businesses and industries from closing down.

The entire undertaking, its sponsors emphasize, would involve almost no use of critical materials, and the manpower requirements for the canal job, it is asserted, would be small, because it would be almost wholly machine excavation through level country. As for the cost—$44,000,000, according to the Army engineers—it would be only a small fraction of the $250,000,000 which the Federal Government is now paying annually to the oil companies to help them meet the extremely heavy cost of transporting oil to the East by rail.

For your edification I want to call your attention to two other timely editorials published by the Providence Journal—a member of the august assemblage known as the mighty press. These editorials were published during June of 1942—you will recall that was an election year and Democratic Members of Congress had to be defeated, even if Rhode Islanders did freeze.

The first, published June 19, 1942, the day after the House passed the Florida barge canal and pipe line bill, is as follows:

[From the Providence Journal of June 19, 1942]

BOONDOGGLE

The wartime House did not do itself proud or help the taxpayer's pocketbook or make any true provision for relief of the oil shortage in the East when it authorized construction of a barge canal across Florida.

The trans-Florida pipe-line project which was included in the authorization could be undertaken without passing any legislation, but perhaps its inclusion was thought to make the canal scheme smell sweeter.

It doesn't. The canal will take from 18 months to 3 years to build, if the Senate concurs and the President approves. The objection voiced by Representative BENDER, of Ohio, was to the point—"If the submarine menace is not ended by then," he said, "I'm afraid we'll all be gone."

The assertion of Representative MCCORMACK, of Massachusetts, that "if we had this barge canal now it would be of inestimable value to the country" does not make sense, except as a cover for a pork-barrel project. It is the pork, in fact, which the country smells.

Can Mr. MCCORMACK show where he can get the barges if he had the canal? Can he demonstrate how the narrow, shallow, incomplete inland waterway north to New York could handle the traffic necessary to provide real relief, if the barges were available? Can he prove that the labor, reinforcing steel, and machinery required to build a five-lock canal across Florida could be safely diverted from the war effort?

Some of Mr. MCCORMACK's constituents ought to lay him a bet that neither Massachusetts nor any other rationed State down to and including Florida will ever get a drop of wartime oil by way of the proposed canal, even if the Senate doesn't slap the boondoggle down, which it should.

The second editorial was published on June 21, 1942, and was an attempt to ridicule the Senate majority leader, who had the temerity to express an interest in a measure which would help New Englanders to get oil for the coming winter. It reads:

[From the Providence Sunday Journal of June 21, 1942]

THAT BARGE CANAL

Senator BARKLEY, of Kentucky, predicted here Thursday night that the Senate will pass the Florida barge canal bill. "We must provide gasoline and fuel oil for you people of New England," he said.

Thanks, Senator, but it is officially stated that the canal would take at least 18 months to build, or until January 1944, which seems a long way off to us.

And even then, Senator, there will be the little matter of barges. On the basis of an average round-trip distance of 2,500 miles between Gulf oil ports and delivery points in the rationed area, at an average towing speed of 5 miles per hour, the round trip would take about 21 days.

To bring in 300,000 barrels daily, 120 barges of 2,500-barrel capacity would have to be loaded every day, and 120 barges times 21 days makes 2,520 barges. Where will the steel come from, Senator? And how about the towboats, at least 500 of them?

There is still another little matter. Does the Senator imply that the Navy will not have driven off the U-boats by January 1944, permitting resumption of efficient oil transport by oceangoing tankers? If so, what has the Navy to say in reply?

Perhaps Senator BARKLEY was hasty in what he said here. Perhaps he ought to get all the facts together for presentation to the Senate when the barge canal bill comes up.

Apparently roused to fury by the prospect that the Senate would likewise pass this measure, the same editorial page carried the pronouncement that Congress was playing "peanut politics, like Lilliputians binding up Gulliver," and went on to say:

There is no sinister conspiracy to discredit Congress. Congress is discrediting itself.

The same editorial page carried a great cartoon. It depicted a fat Congressman lying in bed, with a beatific smile on his countenance, while in his head danced visions of fat pork barrels, swimming gracefully in an endless line through the Florida barge canal.

This great example of foresight and demonstration of consistency comes from the press that believes that it alone, in the words of the Federalist, "possesses the most wisdom to discern, and most virtue to pursue, the common good of society."

FOOD

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make some informal observations on a subject that is engrossing the attention of the country at this moment. It is the subject of food. I shall address myself to it as a member of the loyal opposition. On February 22, the Vice President of the United States, at the Washington Birthday dinner at the Mayflower Hotel, in the course of his remarks said:

It places upon the Republican minority the responsibility for really behaving as a loyal opposition and abstaining from tactics which are purely political.

So I want to abstain from tactics that are purely political and discuss a subject that is in no sense political whatsoever. There is nothing more political about the production of food than there is about an earthquake. The subject of empty bellies is going to engross the attention of the American people as no other issue has done. I believe there is no question but that we are on the threshold, if not in the midst, of a food crisis right now, and I fear that it has not been anticipated and that is the reason for these observations. I say that in my judgment there has not been an over-all food program, and the possible stringency in the country has not been anticipated, as indicated by the records of those who have been identified with the subject of food. In the annual report of the Secretary of Agriculture for 1940, Mr. Wickard said:

Our situation now from the standpoint of reserve supplies is exceptionally strong.

On the 27th of May 1941, Mr. WALLACE, the Vice President, in an article which he contributed to a pamphlet on nutrition and national defense gotten out by the Department of Agriculture, had this to say:

In this war, thanks to the ever-normal granary and the efficiency of modern farm production, we can approach the problem more constructively than in the last war.

Now, get this:

There seems little likelihood that we shall have meatless days or days without sugar. Apparently we do not have to cut down on our food needs in order to make sure that there is a surplus to send to our friends across the sea.

That is Mr. WALLACE talking, onetime Secretary of Agriculture and now the Vice President of this country.

Two days after Pearl Harbor, on the 9th of December 1941, the President went on the radio and, among other things, said this:

A review this morning leads me to the conclusion that at present we shall not have to curtail the normal use of the articles of food. There is enough food today for all of us and enough left over to send to those who are fighting on the same side with us.

That statement was made by the President 2 days after Pearl Harbor.

About 3 weeks after Pearl Harbor—to be exact, on the 27th day of December 1941—Mr. Evans, Administrator of the A. A. A., was participating in a round-table discussion in the Hotel Pennsylvania in New York City. There he made this statement, as quoted in the New York Herald Tribune of that date:

Assurance that the United States will not be confronted with food shortages and rationing was given by R. M. Evans, Administrator of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, at a round-table discussion of the emergency food problems at the Hotel Pennsylvania yesterday. When the war situation hit we were prepared to handle the food problem, due to our previous planning, said Mr. Evans. The farmers have been canvassed and know what they are expected to produce. There is no reason to believe that the people of the United States and any other country cannot expect all the food that is necessary. There is no reason why there should be any rationing here or that prices should go very far above the present level.

There you have some quotations from gentlemen who have been identified with the problem of food production, and as late as 3 weeks after Pearl Harbor were giving assurances to the country that there would be no food stringency, that rationing would be unnecessary, and that there would be food enough for us and for our allies.

On the basis of those statements I think it is eminently fair to conclude that there has been no comprehensive food program and that the Department of Agriculture and other officials charged with this responsibility have not been seeing into the future and determining the needs of this country and our allies, and cutting the cloth of the food plan accordingly.

There is no question about a food crisis. On February 20, 1943, the Institute of Food Distribution got out a digest. There they carried a long article called Serious Food Shortage Probable, in which they go on to analyze the factors and reasons that will enter into it.

As early as November—in fact, on November 2, 1942—there was a two-page spread in Time magazine on this subject. Now, that is 3 months ago, and here is the language of that article:

Statisticians talked in a babel of tongues, but it was left to the United States housewife to see through without words. The United States was in trouble with the most vital of all supplies—food. She knew it from the simple evidence that her grocer's shelves and butcher's hooks were empty.

About that time Mr. Paul Willis, who was president of the American Grocers' Association, made this statement:

A scandal far greater than the rubber situation looms in the immediate future. Unless immediate steps are taken to coordinate this country's system of food production and distribution, a major food shortage is a certainty.

Here are people who have canvassed the situation. Here are people who have realistically appraised the problem and as early as November were all predicting that there would be a serious food shortage in the country, and it remained for the fuse of canned goods rationing to touch off the explosive and bring it home with a loud report to the people of this country.

It occurs to me that this matter of food production is elementary insofar as the facts are concerned. There is, first of all, the job of producing food. Second, there is the job of processing food. Third, there is the job of distributing food. It does not make any difference how many potatoes they grow in Maine; it does not make any difference how many potatoes they grow in Idaho or how many soya beans they grow in Illinois or how many peanuts are grown in Georgia or how much flax is grown in North Dakota or how many vegetables are produced in Colorado, California, or Louisiana. If they are not processed and distributed and made available to the consumer they have no commercial usefulness. I have heard very little in the discussion about the processing and distributing factors that enter into this whole food picture.

But let us consider for a moment item No. 1—namely, the production of food. First, you have to have the land. Certainly we have land in abundance right now. Always we have had it. Second, you need manpower. Of that I want to speak directly. Third, you need money in the way of finances and credit for farmers. The country is filled with money. The various credit agencies of the Government have sufficient legislative authority and sufficient funds to make any form of production loan available to any farmer for any kind of commodity.

Next, you need markets. The market is here. The very evidence of people who are marching on grocery stores in order to get a supply of tinned food is the best evidence of a market. You need weather, but weather is one of those unpredictable things, and if we fail to have that kind of good, consistent growing weather and moisture that we have enjoyed in the last 5 or 6 years, this whole food program is going to become even more acute.

Finally, you need the disposition to produce. When Mr. Wickard came before the subcommittee for agriculture in the Appropriations Committee that considered this $125,000,000 incentive request of his, I said: "Mr. Secretary, I am satisfied that the farmers of the country are just as patriotic in tilling the soil as our men in uniform are in fighting on the combat fronts."

I do not believe they need any incentive other than a fair price; that is all the incentive they need; and if it needs further proof, let me observe that the University of Illinois made a canvass of every farm in the State and found that No. 2 on the list of incentives for farmers was their desire to do a patriotic job and to participate in the war effort by serving on the farm front and producing war crops and other foods that are necessary. Nobody can ever persuade me that the farmers need a little special cash incentive of some kind or other as the Secretary would set up for the purpose of tilling the soil and devoting themselves to this very critical problem of food which disturbs the whole country at the present time.

So we have the land; we have the money; we have the markets; we cannot control the weather; there is a disposition to produce. This leaves three other factors: The first one is manpower, the second is machinery, and the third is the price that the farmer gets. Let us look at manpower.

After a long controversy over manpower the farm organizations finally made their representations to the Senate last year which eventuated in the adoption of the so-called Tydings amendment to the amendments that had been enacted by the House to the Selective Service Act. We had a good deal of discussion over this on the floor at the time, but it remained for the Senate to propose that amendment which in effect would defer a man who was regularly employed in an essential farm occupation and so long as he remained identified with that occupation. Once he left, once he was no longer an essential food producer, that was the end of his deferment. Insofar as I can ascertain about 364,000 have been deferred under the Tydings amendment this far. One statement I saw this morning said 364,000. The other statement I got from Mr. Tolley, of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics. He said the most current figure they had was about 350,000; but do not forget that nearly 2,000,000 people have been siphoned from the farm either into the armed services or have voluntarily left the farm to go into defense plants at higher pay.

I am not disposed to lay the whole problem upon the Army and the Navy, because it may be that but a small percentage of those who have been taken from the farm have actually gone into the armed services. Certainly we know that many have gone from the farms to find a job in some defense plant.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It may be of interest to the gentleman and to Members of the House to know that Secretary Wickard in appearing before the Foreign Affairs Committee in connection with our consideration of the Lend-Lease Act and its impact upon American agriculture testified that according to the best calculations his Department could make, that of all of the men who have been drained away from agriculture since January 1, 1941, something over 60 percent have been drawn to factories and something less than the remainder, which would be less than 40 percent, to the military services.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Let me interpose. That simply gives point to the observation that I just made that you cannot put the whole responsibility upon the armed services, because everyone knows that a good many of them have left the farms to find these lucrative jobs. I now yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. The reason they have left the farms and gone to the factories is that under the laws that have been passed and the regulations that have been put into force they have depressed farm prices so far below industrial wages that these people leave the farm and go to the factories in order to make a living.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I would say that is probably a collateral reason and does not enter particularly into the thing I want to say, namely, that there is confusion, there is lack of perspective, there is failure to find agreement in this whole manpower situation so that there can be a distribution of manpower to those essential fronts that are indispensable in maintaining a war economy.

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. CREAL. In making that calculation of 60–40, charging allurement to factories with 60 percent, I am afraid the gentleman is overlooking one valuable point: One-half of the factory workers are over draft age and put off the subject of military service if they were at home. I maintain that the men who are in the Army and the men who are in the factory would not run over 50–50 that are competent military material. We are overlooking all those 45-year olds in the factories which the military service would not have touched anyway.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I may say to the gentleman from Kentucky that we have been overlooking that. I think the gentleman from New York said it was a sort of guesswork figure; that is, it is the best figure they had. It cannot be resolved with anything like mathematical certainty. I am sure I do not know, I am sure the Secretary of Agriculture does not know. I could not get the figures. So it has not been definitely ascertained; but the fact remains that it is common knowledge that men of all ages have gone from the farm into the defense plants; but still we do not know what the percentage is or as to whether or not they are still amenable to military service under the Draft Act. That does not, of course, change the essential point we are trying to make. It may be more, it may be less, but the point is the manpower problem is still there.

Mr. RANKIN. If the gentleman will yield, I may say in answer to the gentleman from Kentucky that men over military age were probably the best class of farm labor in the whole country.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is entirely probable.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Does the gentleman believe the problem can be solved better by letting the Army men be ordered to harvest the crop or by leaving the men who are on the farms there, or sending others back? Which is the gentleman's idea?

Mr. DIRKSEN. If the gentleman will relieve me for a moment from an answer, I will come to that answer, because I want to discuss it directly in proper sequence.

Look at the strange inconsistencies that have crept in. Maybe they are necessary. I do not know. But they do not look reasonable to me. The Selective Service takes farm hands. The farm hands leave the farm to go into defense plants. Then the State Department makes a treaty with Mexico to bring in Mexicans for work in California and Arizona. I suppose it is all right. But the point is, it looks like going a long way around to arrive at a solution of this problem.

Under the Selective Service, the Army takes experienced hands from the farm, and the farmers then often cannot properly take care of their dairy herds and have to sell them. Only this week the Federal security administrator of Maryland said they were ready to buy milk cows that were being thrown on the market by herd owners because they did not have labor enough to take care of them, or for any other reason. So we take men off the farm, the farmer has to throw his dairy herd on the market, and another Federal agency steps in to buy them or to negotiate some kind of a deal whereby they can be distributed to some other farmer in the locality.

The Army takes men from the farm through the instrumentality of the Selective Service, or they are permitted to go into defense plants. Then the President suggests that we ought to take increments from the Army for short periods of time and transfer them to the farm so long as it does not interfere with their training and the basic program of the Army, maybe for 1 day, maybe for 2 days.

Can you imagine that? Can you imagine the colonel in charge of a regiment suddenly bringing in his battalion commanders and company commanders and saying to them, "Gentlemen, I have here a directive"—that is the favorite term, a "directive"—"that we are to pile on a train and go out here into Cherokee County, Mont., and bring in the wheat." But any rational being knows that that is not the solution for farm manpower any more than the experience we have had in recent months of a Connecticut farmer who sent down to the United States Employment Service for some farm hands and they sent him one drunk, one epileptic, and one schoolboy.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. On that point, I noticed where they were going to send soldiers into the field to pick cotton. I know you are the finest bunch of gentlemen on that side of the aisle, but I would not feed you to pick cotton for me, because you do not know how. You have to grow up in the cotton field to know that. Cotton picking is an art. I would rather have one of those old boys from down on the creek in my district who grew up on a cotton farm pick cotton in my field than three or four men, the best, even though they worked themselves to death, who had never picked any cotton. So it is just stupid, in a way, to talk about sending men into a cotton field to pick cotton, men who have never had any experience in gathering cotton at all.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. And we do not want any of your cotton pickers up telling us how to make tanks.

Mr. RANKIN. That is right.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. DIES. Does not the gentleman think that the real trouble arose because of our failure to treat the farm as a war industry and to have some coordinated and sensible policy?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think that states the case.

Mr. DIES. My district is half industrial and half agricultural. We have a great many big shipyards. The shipyards and the Government and everyone are making appeals to the people to leave the farms. They have placards in all the restaurants. There is no effort being made to keep the men on the farm. We have so many foolish regulations, such as the difficulty in trying to get permits of public necessity to operate a tractor to haul products, that the farmers generally are discouraged. Here is the Government itself inducing them to go to the industries. Does not the gentleman think that that is the real cause of this trouble?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think so.

The next proposal to meet this farm-labor problem appeared in the February 17 issue of the official magazine for the War Production Board, known as Victory. Here is a cartoon with the title "Pitch In—3,500,000 Volunteer Agricultural Workers Wanted Now."

We are going to start a recruitment program for girls and boys, for a high-school victory corps, for folks who live in rural areas and in urban areas, for that matter, to take them out to the farm, from one evidently nonessential pursuit or industry into one that is more nearly essential or related to the war effort. That is the thing for which Mr. Wickard has requested $60,675,000.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentlewoman from Illinois.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Would the gentleman repeat that? Did I correctly understand him to say that the Secretary of Agriculture has asked for money for a corps of women farmers?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Partly women and partly men, young folks and old folks.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Is that for our part of the country, out in the Middle West?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I assume it is for all parts of the country. Here it is:

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATE OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, HOUSE DOCUMENT NO. 106

Communication from the President of the United States transmitting to Congress this request dated February 10, 1943:

"For expenses necessary for the formulation, development, and execution, under the supervision and direction of the Secretary of Agriculture and either independently or in cooperation with individuals or agencies, public or private, of a plan to assist in providing an adequate supply and distribution of labor, including sharecroppers and tenants, including aliens for the production of agricultural commodities essential to the prosecution of the war, including recruiting, placement, and transportation of such labor within the continental United States and elsewhere; including transportation of their families and household effects;

"(2) Furnishing by loan, grants, or otherwise of medical services, training, subsistence, and shelter;

"(3) Construction or lease and operation of labor supply centers and other necessary facilities and services;

"(4) Employment of persons, including aliens and organizations by contract or otherwise at the seat of Government and elsewhere;

"(5) Purchase, exchange, operation, and maintenance of passenger-carrying vehicles;

"(6) Printing and binding;

"(7) Acceptance and utilization of voluntary, uncompensated services, $65,075,000."

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. There are not any women in that.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The general phrase "recruitment of agricultural workers" simply bears out what is appearing in the official Victory magazine of the Government, that they propose to develop a farm army, including men and women.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Well, they will not work. The gentleman comes from Illinois and he knows. I do not mean the women will not work, but they know their capacity, and whether they do or not, they cannot work on our mechanized farms. We have expensive machinery. We cannot get parts. We need skilled labor, and while the women might be fine in some parts of the country where they raise truck gardening, perhaps, they will not do in the Middle West.

I speak as one who tried to be a farmerette in New England in the last war when I was in school in Northampton, Mass. They took a corps of us out there and we were asked to husk corn. We did it with a little picker. I think I was supposed to be the best husker, perhaps because I was the huskiest, but even on that New England farm where we went out in the morning at 8 or 9 o'clock and had tea at 4 in the afternoon and then quit, I do not think I husked 15 bushels in 2 weeks, and when I told the people at home about it, they said, "Thank goodness, we do not have anybody like you on our farms."

Mr. DIRKSEN. Let me say the gentlewoman from Illinois merely anticipated what I had in mind saying, that when you buy a mechanical corn picker for $800, or you pay $1,200 for a tractor, or you pay equivalent amounts for other machinery on the farm, two elements are involved. First, a person who has no mechanical experience and who does not know anything about farm work, would have to undergo a rather extensive course of mechanical education before they can operate such machines. Secondly, with machinery at a premium today, a farmer is not so apt to trust high-priced machinery to some inexperienced hand, only to have it jammed or get into difficulty, and then to discover through his county rationing board that it is difficult to get parts, and certainly almost impossible to get new machinery. The gentlewoman from Illinois is exactly right.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Further I happened to be talking to a farmer from Illinois this noon and we mentioned this subject. I said, "Do you know of a single man you employ who does not have to operate two or three very difficult-to-handle machines during the day, know how to interchange the parts? It is just like a factory, is that not true?" And he said, "That is true. We could not possibly pick up stenographers or clerks and try to use them on our farm." I further think if this administration contemplates such a ridiculous, silly program, this Congress should rise to a man and stop it.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Let me say to the lady from Illinois [Miss SUMNER] that since she was in Massachusetts in 1920 Harvard has developed a new technique. She is turning out denatured Americans now that would surprise you. Some of them can teach the farmers how to milk ducks, show a blacksmith how to weld a wooden handle to a pewter spoon, train one to extract sunbeams from cucumbers, or to manufacture gunpowder out of ice.

Some of them can graft a dead bough to a living trunk and make it blossom as the rose, mix oil and water together placidly in the same bottle, and make boon companions of the spider and the fly—to say nothing of their superb efficiency in promoting social gains.

Indeed, they are making for us a new world.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for an additional 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will remind the gentleman there are two other special orders.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman from Mississippi does not care to hear from Massachusetts. Massachusetts furnished the brains of the New Deal, did it not? Through Mr. Frankfurter down there you recall how the White House was almost fully staffed from Harvard.

Mr. RIZLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. RIZLEY. I want to say to the gentlewoman from Illinois if there is any question about what the gentleman has said to the House as to this being the contemplated program of the Department of Agriculture, all she needs to do is to come before our committee which is holding hearings and the Secretary will be there in the morning. He released a statement today before the committee in which he outlines the very things that the gentleman from Illinois has been suggesting to the House, $65,000,000 plus, that he contemplates using for the purpose that the gentleman from Illinois indicated they expect to use it for.

Let me say to the gentleman that it is not a matter of guesswork on the part of the program that has been suggested by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Let me indicate that the situation is acute even now. The monthly labor survey by the United States Department of Agriculture for January contains this statement:

> Farmers of the country hired 185,000 additional men and women during January compared with 220,000 new employees in January 1942, and were short 154,000 hired employees at the beginning of this month.

It is here. That is the Department speaking. We cannot quarrel with those figures; and the reason for simply enumerating these various factors that I have presented to you thus far is to indicate that there is no consistent perfected program even now to solve this manpower problem.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. On that same point I think the gentleman will find that in December the number of farm hired workers dropped to the lowest number since they started keeping records at the Department of Agriculture, some 25 or 30 years ago.

I wish to ask the gentleman this question: If I understand the gentleman's approach it is to this effect, that if these men in the service are sent to the farms they will work for the same wages they are paid as soldiers, but that the Government will then proceed to invoice the farmer for their time put in on the crop. I want to ask this question: Coming to the statement made by the gentleman from Mississippi—and if you will permit me I want to issue a challenge to him. I will challenge any man on that side above 50 years of age to pick cotton in any field where they produce cotton.

Mr. DIRKSEN. But, if I may interrupt the gentleman, I do not want it picked in my time.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I will issue another challenge. I will challenge any man on that side to go into the details with me and talk sugar beets. So I think we are even on that score.

Mr. DIRKSEN. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. CRAWFORD. We have had experience in my section on this question of group help going out to the farms. We are still trying to untangle the question as to the pay, how much should be paid and who should receive the pay by the group which was taken out in the field last fall and where they performed the work under a supervisor.

Does the gentleman believe that that type of work can be made at all satisfactory to the farmer with reference to paying the work, supervising the work, and the farmer selling the crops and paying the wages for the work?

Mr. DIRKSEN. If the gentleman will permit, I will deal with that in just a few minutes. I am going to show him who is going to get the money and how it is going to work.

Is it not strange that after the Tydings amendment intended to defer agricultural workers was approved that it should be necessary for 40 Senators to have to join together in a Senate measure in order to secure the deferment of farm workers? Is it not strange that 30 Senators had to join together in another bill to seek to procure furloughs of farm workers who had been inducted into the Army in order to permit them to go back to the farms to produce their crops? I will give you one illustration, one case of one young farmer out in my country who had 14,000 bushels of corn in the field. They sent a certificate out to the camp in a western State showing that he was one of the master junior farmers in his State. They sent large photographs taken on the farm showing him working with a tractor, plowing corn, and everything else, and still they could not get him out of the service. He was finally furloughed to pick his corn but he is still in the service. Now, there is no coordination.

I asked Mr. Wickard in effect: "Have you an arrangement with the War Manpower Commission? Have you some kind of arrangement, a definite arrangement, with the Army about this matter?"

He answered in substance: "No, there is no definite arrangement, no definite formal arrangement."

And so the farm manpower problem is one of those amorphous things in the midst of a food crisis that has not been solved, and the manpower problem is still here.

Now, getting to the observation made by the gentleman from Michigan: On the 20th of August, 1942, the Department of Agriculture issued a release which among other statements contained this language:

> The United States Department of Agriculture announced today that administrative machinery for transporting domestic farm workers into areas where serious shortage exists will be completed early in September.

That was in August when the announcement was made. Quoting further:

> Funds available for transportation of workers are limited, and certain conditions of employment must be met before the Government undertakes to pay transportation of these workers. These conditions include payment of prevailing wages with a minimum of 30 cents per hour or an equivalent piece rate.
> Wage boards through public hearings will determine the prevailing wage in given areas * * * adequate housing, and sanitary facilities. The Farm Security Administration will pass on such provisions locally. Employers will be expected to furnish performance bond or other acceptable guaranty fulfillment of contract agreements.

That was in August, but on the 22d of June 1942 the Administrator of the Farm Security Administration, to whom Mr. McNutt and Mr. Wickard had entrusted the responsibility for this domestic and Mexican farm-labor transportation program, got out a memorandum. I expect

I was not to see it, as it was evidently a confidential memorandum, but I have it, anyway. On page 4, paragraph 8, there appears this language:

The Farm Security Administration in cooperation with appropriate Federal and State agencies shall make all necessary provisions for insuring continuous compliance by employers of domestic agricultural labor transported under this program, with wage provisions, working conditions, housing, sanitary and other living standards, transportation requirements, and all other provisions of employment contracts entered into by such employers, and shall provide the necessary machinery for satisfying grievances and dissolving disputes.

You see what Mr. Baldwin, of the Farm Security Administration, is undertaking to do? You see what Mr. McNutt is undertaking to do; you see what all those who have a finger in the pie are seeking to do? They want to extend a kind of social control to the farms of the country, and so there must be an assurance on the part of the farmer before he can get a hired hand under this program that the sanitary facilities are all right, I suppose there must be indoor plumbing instead of the kind I saw out on the farm when I was out there as a kid. There must be medical facilities, agreement about subsistence, about the amount of time that shall be worked, about prevailing wages, and that a board be appointed by the Secretary to pass on grievances.

Let us take this example. Here is a farmer with half a dozen hired hands. They get into a dispute with the farmer. They say they are not getting enough money, the conditions are not right. The farmer may want to dismiss them. He will not dismiss them under that program because Mr. Baldwin and the Farm Security Administration will step in and say, "Here, there is a grievance, and it is a bona fide grievance, so there must be a wage board to determine and dispose of this grievance, since you signed a contract with the F. S. A."

When in the name of common sense are they going to quit tying social reform to the problem of manpower when the country is faced with an emergency famine in some articles? When are they going to stop it?

They had a meeting over on the Senate side Saturday afternoon. If the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. ANDERSON] is here, he will bear me out. They called all this to the attention of the Farm Security Administration, so they are going to modify their contract with the farmers, they are going to modify this social program they are seeking to impose upon the land. But their modifications do not mean anything as long as Mr. Baldwin is administering the program, for why did he inject the Social Security into it to begin with? It is too much to believe that he will not get back to the social aspects of this proposal.

When the Arizona long-staple-cotton growers supplicated that group for help, they laid out before them four single-space typed pages that they had to sign and enter into as a contract between them and the Farm Security Administration. They could not do it. They had to leave some of the long-staple cotton in the field, notwithstanding the fact that the military authorities were fairly praying for it because it filled a very necessary and critical use. So here is this social program.

The Secretary now has requested $65,075,000 for a recruitment program. You will notice in the language which came from the Budget Bureau that it speaks about an investigation of wage rates and all that sort of thing. It is seeking to translate and to apply the Fair Labor Standards Act to the farmers of the country. Then they wonder why the food program has bogged down and why we have an acute manpower problem.

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. CREAL. I have been listening a long time to hear the medicine prescribed. Is the gentleman in favor of lifting farm prices in general, taking the ceiling off?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes. Let me get to that directly. I want to prescribe the remedy as soon as I make the case.

Mr. CREAL. The gentleman can answer "Yes" or "No."

Mr. DIRKSEN. I shall prescribe the remedy as I see it.

Mr. CREAL. Is the gentleman opposed to the measure of adding all labor into the farm parity price? Is the gentleman in favor of or opposed to adding all labor in fixing the parity formula?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; I am not in favor of going about it in that fashion. Why do we have to go into the back door in order to reach an objective? The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] has a bill that is in the Committee on Rules at the present time, dealing with farm wage rates.

Mr. CREAL. One other question: Is the gentleman in favor of or opposed to the money incentive to produce more?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The incentive request that the Secretary made?

Mr. CREAL. Yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Absolutely. I was one of the six who voted to kill it, and 30 minutes later I said to the Secretary as he came in, "I am one of those who oppose this incentive idea, and I voted against it."

Mr. CREAL. You expressed an opinion on all remedies, and I am listening now for your remedy for the situation that we all agree on.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gentleman anticipates me just a little. I will get to it directly if the gentleman will not take all my time.

Mr. ARENDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ARENDS. Do you think we are at the place where maybe the farmer faces this danger, that he has got to go to a board and say, "I want a man," and they are going to tell him how much he will pay them; that he will work 40 hours a week and receive time and a half for overtime; that they must afford him certain facilities, afford him an automobile to go back and forth to town and a lot of other preposterous things? Do you think we are about at that place now?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Here is this request for $65,075,000, in which they say although there are 95 labor camps owned by the Government that can be used for this purpose, an additional 250 camps will be necessary, which are provided for under this estimate of appropriation. In other words, 250 labor centers are proposed to be established with that money, among other things, in addition to a big amount for administrative purposes and augmentation of the present pay roll.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. GILCHRIST. The Secretary of Agriculture spoke of giving the high-school boys and girls 3 weeks' training so that they can become farmers. I am sure the gentleman from Illinois knows that a high-school boy 17 years of age can be taken out and in 3 weeks' time taught mechanics, how to run these machines; he can become a good agronomist; an animal industry man who knows about the breeding of cattle and the farrowing of hogs; he can become a chemist, a botanist, and a veterinarian all in 3 weeks? Would that not be quite a problem?

Mr. DIRKSEN. He might not produce much on the farm, but he might qualify as a Government farmer down here.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. You were speaking about the extension of the social-control program. May I ask you this: When these men go to work on the farms, if these things go on, is it a part of the administration's program, as you understand it, to require the farmer to sign contracts establishing, for example, the union scale and the check-off?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Well, I do not know how far this is going to go, but the point I make is this: Here we are confronted with a critical food problem in the country and the authorities continue to think in terms of social control, when the farmers are seeking manpower to till the soil.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Have any of them suggested, if he goes on this 40- or 48-hour week, and if men are limited only to those who belong to the union, where the farmer is going to get the money? I remember they said the farmer could pay as high as $200, but they have never told us where he is going to get the $200.

Mr. DIRKSEN. No; outside of the incentive Mr. Wickard uses. Now, he is not entirely blameless. He is a fine gentleman. You would not want a finer man to come and sit down at the table with you or to testify before a committee, but the difficulty is that I do not believe he has an over-all concept of this problem. When they were considering deferring essential workers in the poultry and livestock industry, it was Mr. Wickard who sanctioned the inclusion of the provision to stabilize farm wages. Why does that have to be done now? Why did he not stand up and speak his piece? Does he have to be guided around by all the social reformers down in the Department of Agriculture? If he is going to do the job for the farmers, he ought to stand up and fight vigorously and resolutely with the Director of the War Manpower Commission, with the Director of the Stabilization Board, and with everybody until we get somewhere on this program because it is his responsibility if there is going to be an acute famine and starvation in the country, and I propose to say it to him.

Mr. ROWE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. ROWE. Is it a matter of over-all concept or socialized contamination?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Maybe it is both. Now, here is something that I probably ought not say, but I am going to say it. I will probably be criticized for saying it, because I cannot prove it. But I understand that when they were considering the application of the Tydings amendment to the War Manpower Commission they actually had under discussion down there behind closed doors the possibility of including in the directives to the draft boards that if there was a request for a deferment they should consider, along with everything else, whether the farmer was paying a substandard wage. I know that it was discussed. I cannot bring you the printed document, unfortunately. If true, that does not leave Mr. McNutt blameless in the matter. What I want to know is when they are going to stop injecting this note of constant social reform into a program that means full bellies and high morale and contentment of mind for the American people when we expect the most of them in the prosecution of the war effort.

Mr. RAMEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. RAMEY. On the small grape-growing islands of Lake Erie all the boys were taken off the islands because the ruling was that the raising of grapes was not agriculture, because some were used to make wine. The boys were taken off the islands and girls were brought from Marblehead Peninsula, and for each girl there were three or four inspectors called social engineers. In view of the fact that they rebelled against the social engineers, they fined the little boat that carried the grapes, because they said that the little boat that contained five or six men was not equipped like an ocean liner.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I must go on.

Mr. DIES. The gentleman constantly uses the phrase "social reform." What he means is regimentation.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Oh, definitely.

Mr. DIES. Then why do you not use that language?

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is what it is.

Mr. DIES. There is no reform to it; it is just regimentation.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Well, they are just trying to reform the farm structure of the country and bring it to heel. Here is a quotation from the December 15 issue of Victory, the Government's official magazine. It contains the title "Crop Units To Guide Farm Deferment." It is a strange thing. You have got to make 18 points in order to get deferment. The farmer who grows artichokes, hops, cantaloups, watermelons, and that sort of thing is just out of luck. Those are pointless items. For instance, if you have 12 head of milk cattle, you get 1 point; if they are feed cattle, it takes 20 to give you 1 point. It takes 600 broiler chickens to give you 1 point, but if they are egg-laying chickens, only 75 will get you 1 point. Twenty hogs are equal to 1 point, or 40 turkeys will get you 1 point.

Mr. DIES. What about goats?

Mr. DIRKSEN. There are no goats on here so far as I can see.

Here are distinctions between corn and edible beans, rice, broomcorn, green peas, sweet corn. Of that 5 acres will give you a point as against barley, wheat, and grain sorghums where you need 15 acres to get a point; and so on. A member of the draft board has to be a combination cost accountant, lawyer, and mathematician, and be extremely versatile to work out deferment for a farmer of draft age.

Is that the way it ought to be done? Here is the author of the Selective Service Act [Mr. WADSWORTH]. I am sure I speak with his approval when I say he never had in mind any such silly program as that. Is it not against the American system and the original plan of having one's neighbors decide? Here comes a young man and says he has 120 acres, 40 in corn, 60 in wheat, 20 in pasture, that he has so many cattle, so many milk cows. Do they need this kind of nonsensical stuff to enable a draft board to determine whether such a man should be left on the land to produce the munition of food?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Selective Service System was getting along pretty well until another agency more recently created was put in general charge of the policy.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is right.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That agency is the War Manpower Commission.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is right. They were getting along pretty well, I agree, until a new social slant was developed.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. I should like to ask my friend from Illinois if the list he just held up for our edification——

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gentleman means the point system for keeping a boy on the farm?

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. I want to know if that was furnished our draft boards back home before they had to pass on the cases of these boys?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Oh, definitely.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Then I think some of us begin to have an understanding of the problem of our people back home. The home folks write us; we take it up with the System in Washington, and they say: "Why, it is all in the hands of your local draft board; they are handling it." After all, somebody has hamstrung, put in a strait jacket, the local draft boards back home so that they cannot do anything about it. I think it is high time the country was told what the facts are.

Mr. DIRKSEN. With all the conflicting directives that have been issued in one direction and another it has just become a labyrinth of confusion.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. GAVIN. I served on the State Board of Appeals for the State of Pennsylvania for a year and a half. The gentleman has not any conception what a ridiculous formula they have given the draft boards to figure out why a man should be deferred. We just laughed at it; it was impossible to interpret; we could not figure it out, so we finally discarded it and went back to the old-fashioned American way of determining whether a man was producing farm stuff in sufficient quantities to keep him on the farm. The arithmetic they presented to us, as an average American, I could not understand.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I will say to my friend that before long a member of a draft board will have to have a good working knowledge of logarithms, differential calculus, the squaring of the circle, and the fourth dimension, if more directives are hurled at them.

Mr. KLEBERG. We shall have to send them to Harvard for a while before they take up their duties as members of draft boards.

Mr. ANTON J. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. ANTON J. JOHNSON. When we approved the taking of women into the Army, we were told they were to replace Army men doing desk work, stenographers, messengers; and so on, to release more manpower for the Army.

I just learned that we already have 18,000 WAAC's in various colleges, and perhaps are going to send 40,000 more to college, so we have not gained anything in manpower there; we are nothing ahead. Also, I understand the recent plan is to take 400,000 of these draftees and give them 13 weeks basic training and then give them a long course in the colleges of the country. I do not know where our manpower is going.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The burden of what I want to say is that there are so many inconsistencies, such a failure to have an over-all concept of this manpower problem, and such a failure to develop some kind of area of agreement between the War Manpower Commission and the Department of Agriculture on the one hand and the Department of Agriculture and the armed services on the other that there is confusion even now in the very midst of the crisis.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GAVIN. Why do not we as a Congress here, instead of going through all this talk, have about two or three hundred of us go over and see the Secretary of Agriculture and let him know what we are talking about and demand that he get rid of this particular group of bureaucrats who are trying to jam this stuff down our throats?

Mr. DIRKSEN. No; it is better to have the Secretary of Agriculture come over here to the legislative branch of the Government.

Mr. GAVIN. Then get him over here and get all the theorists who are conceiving these ideas over here to listen to what we are talking about. The American farmer today wants to be relieved from the restrictions and regulations and regimentations that have been strangling him to a point of utter exhaustion. Remove the shackles from the American farmer. He wants to go on his own, and all he asks is a fair price for his product and refuses to go on the charity list of the Federal Government.

Unless the irons are taken off him and he receives the friendly cooperation of our Government in the way of farm equipment, consideration of his labor problems and fair prices for his production, the American people face a serious food shortage. Turn the farmer loose, give him an even break and there will be no question as to his ability to produce the foodstuffs in this all-out effort of America to win the war.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. From whom do the local draft boards receive the directions to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. DIRKSEN. From the Selective Service System headquarters here in Washington.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. Until recently they were received from General Hershey, I believe.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is right.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. Has that been changed?

Mr. DIRKSEN. General Hershey has not been changed, but the Executive order of December 5, 1942, has made the Selective Service System a component in the War Manpower Commission.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. But up until recently the Army fixed these directions to the local board?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes. Mr. Hershey was the Director, and now he has a boss.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. Now he may be influenced by this intervening influence to which the gentleman referred, but he still approves and issues the orders, does he not?

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is right, but he has a boss, let us not forget. Mr. McNutt is the Director of the War Manpower Commission.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. I doubt that Mr. Hershey can be bossed, if the gentleman will excuse me for saying that.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Maybe not. I do not quarrel with that. I am just giving you the organizational set-up.

Just a word or two about machinery. I said the first thing you have to have is manpower. The second thing you must have on a farm is machinery if you are going to produce. First, you have to plow the soil, and you must have plows. There must be disks. There must be harrows. After awhile the crop must be tilled and there must be cultivators. After awhile it must be harvested and there must be corn pickers, there must be tractors, there must be trucks, there must be animal power. All those things that are necessary on a farm today indicate that farming is a mechanized business.

They made a survey of the State of New York. It was a farm-by-farm survey made by the country war boards. When they got through they found that the New York farmers had requested 194,000 pieces of equipment. How many are they going to get? As far as I know, their quota will be about 18,000 farm implements.

I had reference here recently to some folks at home in business who are trying to stimulate egg production and chicken production. Maybe it is not generally known, but you can take a case of eggs and in 16 weeks you can convert it into a thousand pounds of succulent, yellow-legged broilers, but you must have brooder stoves. When they tried to get brooder stoves from the manufacturers they could not get them. The reason is that the War Production Board has not allowed any material for the manufacture of such brooder stoves.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 additional minutes.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, and I shall not object, I had a special order myself to follow the gentleman from Illinois, and I should like to get started some time.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I shall try to conclude this very quickly.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I am not going to object to this request.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, about 30 minutes ago the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CREAL] asked the gentleman a question.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes; I am coming to that.

Mr. KEFAUVER. He asked the gentleman what his revenue was. The gentleman has consumed 30 minutes since then and has not yet answered the question.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I wanted to develop the whole picture.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I should like to know what the procedure is now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois has asked unanimous consent to proceed for 10 additional minutes.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIRKSEN. One other thing about machinery. Let me say to you that probably 10 percent of the soybeans in Illinois are still in the field. One cause is weather; the other cause is that they could not get the machinery to get them out.

Here is one other statement from the chairman of the Citizens for Victory Chapter in South Dakota who wrote the gentleman from South Dakota, FRANCIS CASE, a Member of this House, and said:

> Our farm-machinery quota is 53 percent. It should be 153 percent.

So there is this question of manpower. There is this question of machinery. Finally there is this question of prices. We have been going around in circles, talking about incentive payments, talking about removing the penalty on wheat, talking about removing the market restrictions on peanuts in H. R. 1605, that languished on this floor for several days, taking every kind of a back-door approach to the problem, when, as a matter of fact, from a price standpoint, if you will pay the farmer a proper price, without all these lures, without all these devices, that price will be enough incentive for him to go along and to address himself with vigor and resolution to the cause of producing war crops.

And now the program.

Mr. DIES. Tell us what the gentleman thinks can be done without resorting to regimentation and socialistic schemes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. First of all, we can utilize all the tillable land in the country. We can take off the restrictions if there is going to be hunger and a food shortage, and say, "Here is God's own soil. It needs only rain and sunshine and the devotion of the rugged hands of the farmer to make it produce, to make it full of the promise of full bellies for the people of the country." So, No. 1 is to rearrange this program during the duration so that we utilize our land.

Mr. DIES. In the case of cotton, where there is such a great surplus, would the gentleman remove the quota and let the farmer start producing cotton as much as he may?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Oh, the gentleman forgets that neither the Secretary of Agriculture nor anybody else has asked for an expansion of cotton, because it is not a war crop; it is not edible.

Mr. DIES. Then, on what crops should the quotas be reduced?

Mr. DIRKSEN. On wheat, rice, corn, sugar, all foods, all fibers and all feeds.

Mr. KLEBERG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. KLEBERG. My friend should know, with reference to the question asked by the gentleman from Texas, that cotton is the highest protein-producing crop in this Nation.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gentleman is speaking of the seed.

Mr. KLEBERG. Certainly, and if you are going to have the beef and milk you had better remember that.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is right.

Now, on the question of manpower, why do they not give effect to the Tydings amendment? Why do they not defer these agricultural workers, where a body of citizens, in the form of a draft board, says they are doing a job in an essential pursuit, and leave them there without all this folderol and nonsense?

Finally, why do we not adopt some of the European system, where, when a man is in the army and there is a crop ripened, bring him home for 3 or 4 weeks and let him harvest the crop in the field? Or send him home for a couple of weeks in the spring so that he can address himself to the job of planting and seeding? There is no program for furloughs today. As for deferments, it has not worked properly, for otherwise we would not have this controversy over manpower today. The Secretary of Agriculture himself has not been bold enough to indicate to us that he has resolved that problem anywhere on a formal basis of understanding with the other agencies of Government, such as the Army, the Navy, and the War Manpower Commission.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. KEFAUVER. It is very good to see the gentleman following the suggestions made by the administration. I had understood that most of the quotas on food products had been lifted. Also I notice the President's plan to enable the farmers to have the services of soldier boys.

Mr. DIRKSEN. When?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Well, the President said so.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Oh, you ought to read the President's language. He says 1 or 2 days at a time. How are they going to do planting in 1 or 2 days? You read the President's language.

Now, on machinery, why can there not be made a recheck on the inventories on machinery, a recheck of the whole steel program, in the hope that there can be an increase in the quotas on various types of machines that are necessary to till the soil? There is no evidence that an understanding has been reached with the War Production Board with respect to an increase in the quota on agricultural machinery.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. JENSEN. Especially in repair parts. That is the most essential thing right now, and it will take less steel, and it will give them the repairs for their machinery. If you will give us repairs for the machinery, we will get along pretty good.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Now let us quit a lot of this back-door approach like we have had in the form of these little bills that we have had before the House recently, and let us get these prices up to parity. It does not make any difference what the price of pork chops is if there are no pork chops. That is the problem that is before the Congress and the administration at the present time.

Finally, why not get a tough food czar? We asked Mr. Baruch to bring in a report on rubber—why not similar treatment for food? I am sorry to say I do not believe Mr. Wickard is going to get tough with Donald Nelson or with McNutt, or with the Army and the Navy. I think we need some kind of a food czar; somebody who will stand up and see his job in a crusading light and evaluate agriculture as industry that is identified with the production of a munition of war, and, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] says, then we will get somewhere. But I see no evidence disclosed in the conversations I have had with Mr. Wickard before the committee to indicate that he is going to do that job.

Finally, it is about time we are thinking a little about the food processing and distribution business. A head of cabbage in the field is just a head of cabbage until you put it on the consumer's table. That is one part of this problem that has received no attention at all. But if it does not receive any more attention than it has had in recent days, then Congress will certainly have to take the bit in its teeth. To recapitulate, let us utilize our land, let us solve this manpower problem with deferments and with furloughs in planting time and harvesting time. Let us recheck the whole machinery program and get more machinery for the farmers.

Let us fix the price somewhere close to the farmer so you do not have to hand him a lure in the form of a $125,000,000 subsidy. Parity prices will give him production cost and do the job. Then we will not need a lot of these piecemeal suggestions that have come along for the solution of this problem. The time is now. When you go back home and you find that folks are pretty short on rations you are going to hear about it. It is our responsibility after all. We created the Department of Agriculture; we supply the funds; it is our responsibility to carry through and see that the job of producing food is done.

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. ARENDS. We provided for parity price on farm products, but how can we have a parity price if somebody in the administration insists in putting a freeze on it, for instance in the case of corn, and saying that we cannot get a price that is anywhere near parity?

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is a complicated and difficult problem, but I am persuaded that O. P A. has done an illegal thing, has directly violated the intent of Congress when it blocked the price of corn at 88 cents on the farm, which means $1 on the Chicago market.

Mr. ARENDS. And at the same time taking money out of the pockets of the taxpayers to make up the difference when the whole thing should be taken care of without difficulty by a free play of the law of supply and demand.

Mr. DIRKSEN. If we had a tough food czar who would say to O. P. A. Director Brown, who would say to Coordinator Byrnes, who would say to everybody who had any authority in this field of food production and distribution that we had to have manpower and a fair price, he would finally bring order out of chaos and give us a plan predicated upon the instrumentalities that we have and the quantities that we need.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. The gentleman has ridiculed with great effect, supported by able gentlemen who interrupted him to ask questions but who simply added to his argument, some of the President's suggestions of things that he thought would contribute to relieve this condition. The President in no sense claimed they would be a total remedy. He pointed, for instance, to the use of children, but the idea was ridiculed, asking how they could learn to handle intricate machinery in 2 or 3 weeks. The gentleman knows that children can do all sorts of difficult things and I am sure he will admit that there are many things that an intelligent child, raised on the farm, can do and do well.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Oh, very definitely. My friend is in error when he states that I ridiculed the idea.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. It seems to me that the gentleman from Illinois and the very able gentleman who interrupted him ridiculed the idea.

Mr. DIRKSEN. My statement was that that was not the solution.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. Another suggestion the President put forward and put into effect was the use of the soldiers. The President did not say that that would solve the difficult problem but merely that it would be a help toward solution.

Mr. DIRKSEN. All these makeshifts merely postpone the inevitable; that is all. Let me remind you that you cannot argue with hunger. It is our solemn responsibility as elected tribunes of the people.

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAN ZANDT] may extend his own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an editorial and a resolution.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. WOLVERTON of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the Washington Post.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks, and include a newspaper article.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under special order heretofore made, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURRAY] for 10 minutes.

FOOD

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I can readily see why the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] is particularly disturbed about this matter of food, particularly so as the few remarks I expect to make this afternoon will indicate why he should feel more than the average Member of Congress, with the possible exception of the Representatives from the State of Iowa, that this food problem is a real problem. Today I particularly wish to call attention to the fact that Chicago is the food capital of the world.

Mr. Speaker, the importance of food in its relation to war is receiving more attention each day. In these days of particular interest in food production, it is well worth our attention to realize where the great bulk of the food of our country is really produced. A few States surrounding Chicago contribute a very large percentage of the food of our Nation.

Official reports of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the United States Department of Agriculture, which I have studied, show that in 1941 Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Illinois, and Michigan furnished over one-third of the milk produced in our country. Minnesota, Iowa, and Wisconsin produced over 42 percent of the creamery butter; Wisconsin, Illinois, and Indiana produced over 62 percent of the American cheese of the Nation; and Wisconsin, alone, produced over 11 percent of the milk of the Nation.

Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, and Minnesota produced over 53 percent of the pork of the Nation and Iowa, alone, produced over 20 percent of this pork.

Illinois, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska produced over 36 percent of the beef and veal of the Nation and Iowa, alone, produced nearly one-tenth of the Nation's supply.

Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, and Ohio produced over 25 percent of the chickens and over 28 percent of the eggs of the Nation.

Illinois and Iowa, alone, sell over 55 percent of the corn that goes into manufactured corn products and produce practically one-third of the corn, in bushels, grown in the entire Nation.

Kansas and North Dakota produce over one-third the wheat of the Nation and Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and South Dakota produce an additional 15 percent of the national production. Illinois and Iowa produce nearly a third of the oats and Minnesota, North Dakota, and Nebraska produce over one-third of the barley of the United States.

Minnesota, Iowa, and North Dakota produce over 70 percent of the flax of the country and Minnesota, alone, produces over 47 percent of the flax of the Nation. Illinois, alone, produced 46 percent of the soybeans and with Iowa, Indiana, and Ohio produced over 87 percent of the soybeans of the Nation.

As to farm income, Iowa, from sales from farms, is 7.90 percent; Illinois is 6.17 percent; Minnesota is 4.54 percent; Ohio, 3.86 percent; or a total of 22.47 percent in these four States, with Iowa alone representing nearly one-twelfth of the farm income of the Nation. Iowa, though only 56,147 square miles in area in comparison with other States with over 250,000 square miles, has the largest sales from farms of any State in the Nation.

When you realize that this one State has only 20,000,000 acres of cropland out of the total 341,000,000 acres in the United States, the importance of this one State, in food production, is readily appreciated. My purpose in calling your attention to the facts are twofold.

First. If food is to be produced to feed our armed forces; to feed ourselves, which we have not done for many years; to furnish food to fulfill our lease-lend commitments, and to feed those falling behind our lines as well as occupied countries; we must get this accomplished where they have the land and the productive and fertile soil to accomplish it. If we want coal, we go to the coal-producing areas, and if we want food we must recognize the areas that can produce it.

Second. In talking of manpower, transportation, farm machinery, equipment, and other requisites for more production, we must appreciate the area that can furnish the production. We cannot let any productive acres lie idle. We must provide the priorities necessary to make these acres produce their maximum, or we will not provide the amounts of food that must be produced.

The great Midwest, with the greatest area of rich, fertile, and productive land in the world, is the food hope of this same world today. Many States do not produce enough food for their own populations. The Midwest has never, in history, had the agricultural responsibility it has today. Since Iowa alone is reputed to have 25 percent of the A No. 1 farm land in America, you can readily see that a rather large percentage of the best land in America is within confines of this area. Chicago can most assuredly be termed the food capital of the world.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I rise to compliment the gentleman for bringing in these figures, following the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN]. Here is your food basket, and intermingled with that food basket we are placing these defense orders and building these unbelievable defense plants, and this is pulling the men off the farms into the factories. New York City has already admitted, through its financial interests, that New York has ceased to be the financial center of the world. It is moving to the Central West, because your tens of millions of dollars in defense money is being spent by the people out there. All you need to do is to study the increase in demand deposits and savings and time deposits of the people in those areas, and so you have the conflicting forces of the building of war machines running contrary to the production of food. The gentleman is making an important contribution, showing where the principal portion of the food produced in this country must come from, because there is the soil and the fertility, and that is where they need the farm labor.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I thank the gentleman for his observation, because I have seen that becoming more serious each day. As every new plant comes in, the impact is just that much more, so far as manpower is concerned in respect to the farm. There is one point that we little realize, and that is the small number of farmers who actually contribute to the great production of food. We do not realize the small number that do this. I dare say there are not more than 50,000 farmers who produce the cheese of this Nation. We do not have to take very many of those men from the cheese-producing farms to have an effect upon the market.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman is correct about these farmers who actually produce the food for export, the ones who are producing it on the farms, who shove the food into the market.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I thank the gentleman for his contribution following that of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], and I ask him whether he has figures to bear out those statements that in Iowa and other States there is produced more food that any other section of the country. Notwithstanding that, Iowa has had more voluntary enlistments than from other parts of the country. In spite of that, the draft boards of each community, when they get monthly calls to supply more men, still have to go to the farms, and take more and more off the farms. And that is the cause of the farm labor shortage today. Has the gentleman any figures to bear that out?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. No; I would not have any knowledge of what is happening in any one of the particular States.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. My district is right in the Midwest, in Iowa, in a farming district, and I have letters from the draft boards.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Any State that is producing 10 percent of the beef or 20 percent of the pork and 7 percent of the eggs must naturally feel the effects of a shortage of farm labor. There are only 12 States like Iowa needed to produce as it does; if you are going to keep someone milking, and someone plowing, you had better be keeping them in the Midwest.

Mr. DIES. But does not the gentleman realize that he gets his cottonseed from the State of Texas?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Oh, I live in a district where we do not get any of that seed from Texas. We produce a great quantity of hay there, and use oil meal for protein feed for our livestock.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. When I was home I talked to many farmers about this labor proposition, and I asked them whether or not they could use city help, boys and men and women who had lived in the cities, and transplant them to the farms. They said, "No," that they had tried that and that they had had 6 weeks of it, and they cannot make farmers out of them. They have to have help that has been trained on the farm.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. We have heard, and justly so, requests from the Democratic side for specific remedies for the farm labor problem. May I offer this suggestion. According to the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations, we have approximately 3,000,000 civil service employees in the employ of the Government of the United States. If we could only have a manpower czar who could go into that problem and take one out of every six of these civil-service employees who are cluttering up today that pay roll and which pay roll exceeds the pay roll of the armed forces of the Nation, and put those five or six hundred thousand men into the Army, and take that equivalent number out of the Army who know something about farming, we would do a lot for keeping up production.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. And I would like to say further to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] that I was somewhat modest in what I said about the State of Wisconsin, so that no one would accuse me of demagoging, but I may say that the great State of Wisconsin produces more alfalfa hay than any State in that region, and that is why we do not have to buy any cottonseed meal from the State of Texas.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I was very much interested in the statement of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN] who made the critical statement about the great number of people on the public pay roll. Of course, the gentleman overlooks the fact that the great majority, or three-fourths of these, are working in the war effort.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Oh, no; the gentleman does not overlook anything. I still maintain we have far too many civil-service employees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. In any event, this question is such a broad one, of interest not only to the farmer but to the people in the cities, and also because it deals with furnishing food to people abroad who are suffering, contributions to it should be made on a broad scale rather than from a small, limited point of view. Does my friend agree with that statement?

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. I may say to the majority leader that that is the only attitude I have tried to take on the matter.

Mr. McCORMACK. I know it; that is why I asked the gentleman that question.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. If we are going into the sidelines, we will just end up out in the woods somewhere.

Mr. McCORMACK. In other words, this is a problem for the men and women of this country without regard to party to consider, having regard for all the factors that are necessary to win the war, so that we will do everything we can to help the farmer produce food, because that is one of the prime necessities of war, in my opinion.

Mr. MURRAY of Wisconsin. If the majority leader reads these remarks I should like him to read them in the spirit that I am calling to his attention the places that we must produce that food, if we are going to have it for ourselves as well as for all other purposes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. May I say that I agree thoroughly with the statement of the majority leader.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS] is recognized for 30 minutes.

THE PROBLEM OF FOOD PRODUCTION

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered I may be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Under those circumstances, I am not going to detain the House this evening except for a few minutes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. If the gentleman will yield, may I thank him for deferring. It was very gracious of him, and I am very grateful.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I appreciate the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois. If I had had time to speak, there were some things in the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois that I wanted to comment upon and to discuss. But mainly I have here what I believe to be a constructive program for solution of our food-production problem. I agree it is probably our No. 1 problem today. But we can solve it. And we must. The remarks of the majority leader, just made, hit the nail squarely on the head. In my judgment, the problem of food production is, next to the military conduct of the war, the most important problem America has to face today. It breaks down into three or four parts. One of them is price, another is manpower, another is machinery, and another is the balance of production in order that we may secure these products which are most needed for the war and for our civilian needs.

In connection with this matter, a proper application of such statutes as the Soil Conservation Act can be used to increase the production of America rather than to decrease it. With the lifting of wheat quotas a further step in that direction has been taken. But when some Members have suggested that the whole Soil Conservation Act be repealed I believe they have not thought the matter through. I shall discuss this matter at some length in my later speech.

Now, the price to the farmer has to be as fair to him as the price to the manufacturer of airplanes or ships or guns is to him. We do not expect those manufacturers to produce at less than cost. We must not expect the farmers to do so, either.

We have a shortage of farm labor. On that problem I shall have some proposals to advance which I believe are constructive. Right now I wish to say but one thing in answer to the gentleman from Illinois: If it is necessary for the Government to take a hand in helping to furnish farm labor, then I disagree with the point of view generally expressed by the gentleman from Illinois, which, if I interpret it correctly, implies that the Government has no responsibility for seeing that the conditions of that labor are fair and just. I think it does have such a responsibility if the Government is going to move people into a particular job. As long as the contract is a free and open contract without governmental action, the situation is quite different.

Finally, I wanted to remind the House that we have had some good news from Tunisia this morning. I hope it is still good this evening. I hope that as time goes on it will be possible for us to consider all the things we do more and more under the influence of those great and tragic events that are taking place on the actual battlefields of the world. If you even go down here to the railroad station and see the girls saying good-bye to their husbands and sweethearts, it will give you an influence that we need day by day as we consider our business. These are times that ought to try men's souls and make us very, very much in earnest about all we do.

On Monday, or whenever I get a good chance, I am going to discuss this food production and farm problem, and I am going to discuss it quite freely. Some things I know need correction. Some of them need it very much, indeed. But I am going to also point out some of the constructive measures that can be taken, for the time is past for my viewing with alarm. Much more than that is required of us.

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. CREAL. While this record is being made concerning the farm question, may I say that while we have heard lots of complaints, most of which I agree with, and I could go further and make more, I do not find myself in agreement with every one of the complaints made by the gentleman from Illinois. I condemn this socialistic tendency, but I am going to offer a remedy. I am for the incentive payment; I am for the inclusion of all labor in the parity formula; I am for a more liberal extension of draft exemptions; I am for deferment of a man if he is big enough in agriculture, or for taking him out of the Army and sending him back home; and I am for a compulsory furnishing program for machinery parts. If that does not make enough program, if anybody else has anything to offer they have all day tomorrow to offer it.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. May I say to the gentleman that every one of the points made by him, with one exception, is in the speech I intended to make this afternoon and which I shall make at the first opportunity.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

(Mr. HARRIS of Arkansas asked and was given permission to revise and extend his own remarks in the RECORD.)

THE MANPOWER PROBLEM

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Minnesota and I engaged in a little debate a few minutes ago about what the people on the Federal pay roll are doing. He said in a very loose way, which characterizes a great deal of the criticism of bureaucracy in government, that you can take 1,000,000 or a large number of men off the Federal pay roll.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. If the gentleman will yield, I believe I stated one out of every six men.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The gentleman stated five or six hundred thousand. Anyway, the RECORD will show it.

I have already put in the RECORD today as an extension of remarks an analysis that has been made of just what the civilians on the Federal pay roll do. Later on I am going to get a fuller analysis, but in November 1942 there were 2,750,101 civilian employees on the Federal pay roll. Of those, according to the analysis prepared by Dr. Frank Prescott, who is head of the department of government of the University of Chattanooga, 400,000 civilians in Federal employment were engaged in the task of civilian administration of the war effort. A total of 1,612,256 are used in the operation of the navy yards scattered from Kittery, Maine, to Bremerton, Wash.; Federal arsenals at Watertown, Frankfort, and Rock Island. They build ships, make guns, and do other work that anybody else in a defense factory would do, which is, of course, necessary in the war effort.

Also if you call an employee of the Federal Government a bureaucrat, then you find yourself including letter-carriers, tax clerks, draftsmen, engineers, employees of the Tennessee Valley Authority. They are all covered on the Government pay roll, yet they are building dams, making munitions, working in arsenals, and contributing a very substantial amount to the war effort of our Nation, as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN] must know.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Is it not true also that a very considerable number of people are actually working in the armed services of supply? In the most essential type of work in the war effort? They are civilian employees.

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is true. I understand it is close to 900,000 men.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 2 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Does the gentleman not agree with me that you could go into this Government of ours today—this great civil service that we have today—and take one out of every six men and remove him with benefit both to our Nation and to our armed forces and to our farm labor?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I want to say to the gentleman that I think on the whole the Government handles its employees about as well as private business does. I think that the habit we have gotten into of criticizing and castigating everybody that works for the Government is having a very bad effect, and it certainly is not justified.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Do you feel that it is right today that our civil-service employees' total pay roll should equal or approximate that of the armed services of America?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I do not know how the total pay roll compares to that of the armed services. I will say I know of men who are working as engineers for the Tennessee Valley Authority, whom I know have been offered four or five times the amount they are making working for the Government. You know men working for the War Production Board, for instance, Mr. Wilson, who made $140,000 a year, yet he works for the Government for $9,500. On the whole, considering the demand in private industry, the salaries paid Government employees is modest and in line.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield to the majority leader.

Mr. McCORMACK. Regarding these attacks that are made on bureaucracy, of course, we must have department bureaus in order to operate the Government anyway.

Mr. KEFAUVER. We always have had them.

Mr. McCORMACK. Of course, there can be excessive bureaucracy and I assume that is what they have in mind, but during wartimes we must have more centralized activities than in normal times in order to win the war.

Mr. KEFAUVER. The gentleman is certainly correct.

Mr. McCORMACK. The War Production Board is composed of substantial men in their community life, men who were connected with substantial businesses. They have come here for patriotic purposes to help our country out in this time of war.

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is correct.

Mr. McCORMACK. Whether the dollar a year is right or wrong we will not discuss, but these attacks are made upon men of that type.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Yes; and I may say that I think it must have had a very bad effect upon the morale of those fine men from both political parties, men who came here to give the very best efforts, to have some men get up on the floor every day and make blanket accusations against people working for the Federal Government.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 2 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. Our last crop year up until now was adequate and very successful in feeding our own people and the world, was it not?

Mr. KEFAUVER. It was the peak production of the United States in the history of this country, I am advised.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. And what we are talking about is the evil prophecies of the gentleman over there about the future?

Mr. KEFAUVER. Something that has not happened as yet, yes.

Mr. MORRISON of North Carolina. We are condemning largely in these talks what is in front of us, with a glorious record behind us?

Mr. KEFAUVER. The gentleman is exactly right and it is interesting to see a lot of criticism when our record has been so good. We can all criticize, but very few constructive suggestions are offered.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I want to say that for all these difficulties there is constructive correction, and if there be anything in what the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN] has said, we have already authorized the Civil Service Committee of the House, headed by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK], to make a scientific study of the Government departments for that need.

Mr. KEFAUVER. That is right.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. They will determine whether there is any chance to prune personnel, and if there is, I am certain it will be done.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I am sure it will be.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. I think there is no question about it that many agencies of the Government are working well and plenty of overtime in attempting to do a good job. Very often we find that the reason why they do not do a good job is because of an incapable administrator over them, and we find certain points of criticism. I am reminded of the experience of a good friend of mine who is also known to my colleague from California who took a job in an agency of the Army. There were 2,600 employees in this particular organization in a city other than Washington. He very soon found that either the administration of that particular section of this agency was very badly handled or they were trying to pad the pay rolls; he was not sure which, because he found that he only had on an average of an hour and a half's work to do a day for a man of his ability, and so he resigned and left feeling that he had made a mistake in going there in trying to serve the Government in that capacity. There are cases like that; I hope there are not many of them; and I think that in Washington most of the agencies of the Federal Government are really working overtime and trying to do a good job.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I agree with the gentleman. He takes a very fair and correct viewpoint about the matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I appreciate very much the constructive suggestion the gentleman from California has made. If you take any large organization, certainly one as large as the executive branch of the Federal Government, you are going to have dozens of little aggravating incidents which may look like things not being done right. You parade those little instances before the Nation and the people might be inclined to think the incident is typical of the whole Federal executive department; whereas, as a matter of fact, I think most of us will agree with the gentleman from California that on the whole these men and women in the executive departments are working hard, putting in a lot of overtime work on Saturdays and Sundays and that they are not overly compensated.

Mr. HINSHAW. I would not condemn the whole crowd for the faults of a few.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Many Members on the gentleman's side, I will say to the gentleman, do not. I am glad he takes a very fair attitude about it. This is typical of the gentleman's sense of fairness.

Let me say further that 3 years ago the whole War Department was in the Munitions Building. Now it occupies the entire Pentagon Building, the new Munitions Building, and many others. This expansion has been necessary because of the war; they have had to grow and grow rapidly. The Army has increased 30 or 40 times in size in 3 years. There may be instances where there is poor management, but I do not think any private enterprise in the United States could have expanded to the extent the War and Navy Departments have without making similar mistakes.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEFAUVER. I yield.

Mr. JENSEN. I respect my colleague very much and I do not want him to go on record—and I do not think he wants to go on record—as saying that the Congress of the United States, of which he is a part, does not have the responsibility of seeing that the nonessentials in government are weeded out.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Of course I do not; and I did not say that.

Mr. JENSEN. No; and I am sure the gentleman does not want to leave that impression, as most people would infer from his speech as they read it.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I do not think most people would. I think if the people had all the facts there would be less grumbling about bureaucracy.

Mr. JENSEN. I believe the gentleman realizes that we do have a lot of lost motion and that we are spending quite a little money that is not necessary in this dual Government of ours where they have set up bureaus and spent money so extravagantly.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, I cannot yield further to the gentleman. There has been, of course, a lot of lost motion and a lot of needless expenditure. This we regret, but I am sure these conditions are being ironed out and remedied.

Mr. JENSEN. And I hope the gentleman is going to help.

Mr. KEFAUVER. What I will say is that, considering the enormity of the job on hand and the success that has so far been accomplished, the Federal Government has done a splendid job.

Mr. JENSEN. And the gentleman is going to assist in every way he can to help cut down those nonwar expenditures, I am sure.

Mr. KEFAUVER. I am going to assist in keeping down any expenditures I do not believe to be necessary or proper.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an editorial from a local newspaper in my district.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

THE MANPOWER PROBLEM

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Is there not some misunderstanding about this criticism of the bureaucracy in this respect, that the critics of bureaucracy have in mind not altogether the matter of the numbers that are employed by the Federal Government but the relative need of private industry as compared with that of the Government?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. The gentleman is absolutely right. I want to convey to my good friend, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], that I am sorry that he takes it as an attack upon bureaucracy simply because I stand up here and back up the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] in answering the query from the majority as to some specific suggestions as to how we can help solve the manpower situation and help to secure farm labor so badly needed.

As one of the few men in the House whose profession is farming, I still believe I am right in my statement that a good man armed with the proper authority could go into this vast civil-service system of ours and separate therefrom 1 out of every 6 without harming the war effort in the least, and send those approximately 500,000 men into the armed services, thereby giving an opportunity for an equal 500,000 men skilled in the art of farming to go back and help produce the food the Nation must have to win this war. If that is an attack upon bureaucracy, I have no apologies to make whatsoever. Too much bureaucracy represents creeping paralysis unless checked in time.

Mr. Speaker, I quote herewith, in support of my statements concerning the number of civil-service employees now on the pay roll, from the hearings on the independent offices appropriation bill for 1944, on page 852, as follows, and from the statement of Mr. Arthur S. Flemming, Civil Service Commissioner:

ESTIMATES AND ACTUAL GROWTH OF PERSONNEL IN FEDERAL SERVICE

Mr. FLEMMING. On page 12 of the justifications, you will notice that we estimate the number of employees in the Federal Government by July 1, 1943, will be 2,972,000. I have a chart on that that I would also like to discuss with the committee.

If you will take this chart, you will notice that the actual number in the Federal service at the beginning of the present fiscal year was 2,206,000. The actual number in the Federal service on November 30 was 2,750,000. The actual number in the Federal service on July 1, 1943, if the rate of growth through November 30 is maintained during the remaining 7 months, will be 3,510,000.

Our estimates are based on the fact that, at the time they were prepared, we believed that the total number in the Federal service on July 1, 1943, would be 2,972,000. Obviously it is going to be larger than that. If the present rate of growth were maintained during the rest of the fiscal year, it would reach 3,500,000 by July 1. But I am not saying that it is going up to 3,500,000. It is, however, going to be somewhere in between 2,900,000 and 3,500,000. Just what the figure will be it is very difficult to predict, of course, at the present time.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

SENATE

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1943

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God and Father of us all, amid the maddening maze of things that fill our toiling days with fever and fret we would tarry now in the shelter of Thy shadowing wings. At the inn of the morning we wait for Thee, O Guide and Guardian of our pilgrim way. We need Thy presence every passing hour whether the road be starred with flowers or stabbed with thorns. As we trudge along the path our feet must tread may our eyes be lifted up from the ground beneath them to the eternal hills of peace and power, whence cometh our help. Forgive us that so often we go in the poverty of spiritual rags when we could claim the golden gifts of Thy grace.

We would stay for this moment the noisy shuttle of time that we may catch a revealing glimpse of the larger pattern it is weaving. Tune our tangled lives to the harmony of Thy purpose. Make of our hurrying years a tapestry of beauty. Before evening comes and our work is done, may our glad eyes yet see some victory of liberty over tyranny, of righteousness over injustice, of brotherhood over ruthlessness, of virtue over evil, of peace over war, in our hearts, in our Nation, and in all the world. Amen.

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Montana; to the Committee on Mines and Mining:

"Senate Joint Memorial 8

"Joint memorial to the President and the Congress of the United States relative to the establishment at Great Falls or some other site in Montana of a suitable plant or other facilities for the recovery and production of sponge iron and other strategic minerals from the proven iron-ore deposits in Cascade, Judith Basin, Fergus, and Meagher Counties, Mont.

"To the President of the United States and to the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

"Whereas we are engaged in a war of survival, the duration of which effort is at the present time uncertain;

"Whereas public recognition has been given to the fact that the success of that effort is at present, jeopardized by the lack of sufficient iron and steel scrap to operate our steel mills at capacity;

"Whereas enormous deposits of high-grade low-prosphorus content iron ore do now, and for more than 50 years have been known to exist in Fergus, Judith Basin, Meagher, and Cascade Counties, Mont., suitable under modern metallurgical methods for the economic production of high-grade sponge iron; and

"Whereas sponge iron is a suitable and natural substitute for scrap; and

"Whereas natural gas and coal deposits in unlimited quantities are known to exist and are now being produced in areas immediately adjacent to said iron-ore deposits in ample quantities and with ample reserves to justify the erection of a necessary mill or mills for the production of not only sponge iron, but pig iron, and steel if deemed advisable; and

"Whereas the people of and industries in Washington, Oregon, Idaho, Wyoming, Montana, South Dakota, North Dakota, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia, and Alaska, have suffered industrial retardation directly affecting their standard of living from a lack of iron and steel products by virtue of exorbitant freight rates and the concentration of the iron and steel industry of the nation in the area tributory to the Great Lakes; and

"Whereas development contemplated hereby would provide homes, employment, and a better standard of living for hundreds of thousands of our citizens now serving and to serve in the armed forces of the United States upon their resumption of civil life; and

"Whereas the feasibility of such a plant has heretofore been recognized by the following authorities among others: N. H. Weed of United States Geological Survey, 'Fort Benton Folio' (No. 55, in 1899; 'Little Belt Mountain Folio' (No. 56) in 1899; United States Geological Bulletin by L. G. Westgate in 1920, entitled 'Iron Ore Deposits Near Stanford Mont.'; Report by Dwight R. Woodbridge, M. E., 1916, entitled 'Iron Lands in Little Belt Mountains,' and numerous other publications by geologists and mining engineers of national repute: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring), That an iron and steel plant or other suitable facilities be erected at Great Falls, or some other convenient point in Montana for the production of sponge iron and such other iron and steel production as the war effort and economy of the country may require for the development of the iron-ore bodies known to exist in Fergus, Judith Basin, Meagher, and Cascade Counties, Mont; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded by the secretary of state to the President of the United States, to the Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State, and to any other Federal boards, bureaus, commissions, or agencies executing or exercising duties and functions consonant with the tenor of this memorial."

Two joint memorials of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming; to the Committee on Finance:

"Enrolled Joint Memorial 4

"Joint memorial memorializing the Congress of the United States of America to consider and act upon proposed Federal legislation related to the Townsend plan

"Whereas there is now pending or will be pending in the current session of the Congress of the United States of America, proposed legislation embodying essential principles of the so-called Townsend plan, in which thousands of Wyoming citizens are keenly interested: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Wyoming (the senate concurring), That the Congress aforesaid be, and it is hereby memorialized to promptly, diligently and fairly consider and act upon, at said session, by its legislative branches as such and not merely in committee, the proposed legislation aforesaid; and be it further

"Resolved, That certified copies hereof be promptly transmitted to the President and Vice President of said United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of said Congress, United States Senator E. V. ROBERTSON, United States Senator JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, and Representative FRANK A. BARRETT."

"Enrolled Joint Memorial 3

"Joint memorial memorializing the Congress of the United States to amend titles I, IV, and X of the Social Security Act to provide payments in excess of maximum amounts as the act now provides

"Whereas title I, section 3 (a) now provides for a maximum payment of $40 per month; and

"Whereas title IV, section 403 (a) now provides for payment of $18 for one child and $12 for each additional child per month; and

"Whereas title X, section 1003 (a) now provides for payment of $40 per month; and

"Whereas these payments are inadequate to meet the necessary cost of living in decency and health: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Twenty-seventh Legislature of the State of Wyoming (the senate concurring), That we hereby memorialize the Congress of the United States to amend title I, to provide for a maximum payment of $50 per month; amend title IV to provide for a payment of $22 per month to the mother or relative with whom the child or children are domiciled; and amend title X to provide for a maximum of $50 per month; and be it further

"Resolved, That certified copies of the memorial be sent to the President of the United States Senate and Speaker of the National House of Representatives, and to United States Senators JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, EDWARD V. ROBERTSON, Congressman FRANK A. BARRETT, and to the Honorable Arthur J. Altmeyer."

A resolution adopted by the Puerto Rico Civil Service Commission, San Juan, P. R., expressing solidarity and endorsement of that commission with and to the declaration of rights and petition of justice laid before the President and the Congress of the United States by the legislature and political parties of Puerto Rico; to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

A resolution of the House of Representatives of Puerto Rico; to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs:

"Whereas the Legislature of Puerto Rico has passed certain laws tending to improve living conditions and to protect the welfare of the people of Puerto Rico; and

"Whereas among these laws are to be found the following: Land law of Puerto Rico; law creating the Puerto Rico Water Resources Authority; law creating the Puerto Rico Transportation Authority; law creating the Puerto Rico Development Company; law creating the Development Bank of Puerto Rico; law creating the Puerto Rico Planning, Urbanizing, and Zoning Board; law creating the Puerto Rico Communications Authority; law regulating the sugar industry in Puerto Rico; and

"Whereas some of these laws were sanctioned by the direct vote of the people of Puerto Rico and all were passed by the Legislature of Puerto Rico in the exercise of the power delegated to it by the people of Puerto Rico; and

"Whereas Congressman FRED L. CRAWFORD of Michigan, has introduced a resolution in the Congress of the United States of America with the purpose of having the Congress annul these laws, thus despoiling the people of Puerto Rico, in the midst of the great sacrifices it is making in the military and civil fields for the defense of democracy, of all enjoyment of democracy; and

"Whereas this constitutes an unheard of assault against the liberties of the people of Puerto Rico, the doctrine of President Roosevelt and the American Nation, in America and throughout the world, and its adoption would imply a sinister loss of prestige to that doctrine; and

"Whereas if such a resolution is adopted, not only the people of Puerto Rico, but all small peoples would see democracy declared a fraud, a lie, and a farce by the Congress of the Nation which is directing the war for democracy and which will fundamentally influence the formation of world liberties following victory; and

"Whereas if the precedent is established by which the will of the people and of its legislature in Puerto Rico expressed in the eight laws mentioned has no value at all, the same procedure could be applied to all the legislation and all the democratic acts of the Puerto Rican people and of its legislature; therefore be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of Puerto Rico:

"1. To condemn, as it hereby condemns, in the most energetic and unequivocal terms, the assault against democracy in Puerto Rico and against the principles of democracy outside of Puerto Rico, which the Crawford resolution constitutes;

"2. To condemn, as it hereby condemns, in the most energetic and unequivocal terms, as the representatives of a people struggling for democracy, the fact that in the very Congress of the United States of America a resolution has been introduced of such nature that it brings into disrepute and stains the high motives of the Government of the United States of America in directing the present struggle in the defense and affirmation of democracy;

"3. To declare, as it hereby declares, that, although confiding in the spirit of righteousness of the Congress of the United States and believing that it will not permit the adoption of such sinister resolution, it affirms the unbreakable will of our people to oppose such violation of liberty and democracy by all legitimate means which freemen can and should employ to defend themselves against tyranny and oppression;

"4. To declare, as it hereby declares, that in the employment of the necessary means for the defense of our democracy and our liberty against such sinister assault, our people will act in such manner that our fellow citizens of the north, descendants of Washington and Jefferson, will not have to feel ashamed of us;

"5. That copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States of America, the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, to the chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives, to the chairman of the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs of the Senate, to the Secretary of the Interior, to the American press, to the legislatures of the 48 States, and to all parliamentary bodies of America and of the world which function free of totalitarian tyranny."

By Mr. CAPPER:

A petition, numerously signed, of sundry citizens of Sumner County, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit liquor sales and to suppress vice in the vicinity of military camps and naval establishments; ordered to lie on the table.

A resolution adopted by the Macomb County (Mich.) Board of Supervisors, favoring payment by the Federal Government of a service charge to units of local government where munitions and defense plants are located; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. GILLETTE:

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa; to the Committee on Finance:

"Senate Concurrent Resolution 17

"Whereas the Federal Government in the levying of a tax on gasoline and upon automotive units has invaded a field of taxation heretofore exclusively reserved to the States; and

"Whereas there has never been any direct relationship between such Federal taxes and Federal aid to the States for highway purposes; and

"Whereas it appears that normal Federal aid for highways may not be continued beyond the end of the present fiscal year, and

"Whereas gasoline rationing has drastically and seriously reduced State revenues for highway purposes; and

"Whereas the Federal Government has sources of revenue not available to the States: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Senate of the State of Iowa (the house of representatives concurring) do memorialize the Congress of the United States to take action necessary to effect the retirement of the Federal Government from the field of automotive taxation, with special reference to the tax on gasoline and the use tax on automotive units, and that a copy of this resolution be sent to each United States Senator and each Congressman from Iowa."

By Mr. CLARK of Idaho:

Two joint memorials of the Legislature of the State of Idaho; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"Senate Joint Memorial 3

"To the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States of America:

"We, your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Idaho, do respectfully represent that

"Whereas the need for the speeding up of the production of food by the farmers of this Nation calls for every aid and assistance to be given the farmers to produce the greatly increased amounts of food needed to carry on the war effort; and

"Whereas the restrictions placed on the amount of machinery to be made available for farm use in 1943 will most seriously curtail full production of food; and

"Whereas the full production of food is a most necessary need: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Senate of the State of Idaho, the House of Representatives of Idaho concurring, respectfully request and petition the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled to immediately take steps to have the allocation of farm machinery increased to permit the fullest use of the manpower and energy of the farmers in the production of food.

"Immediate action is necessary to make adequate machinery available for use in time to plant the 1943 crop; and be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of state is hereby directed to forward copies of this memorial to the Honorable JOHN THOMAS, the Honorable D. WORTH CLARK, the Honorable HENRY DWORSHAK, and the Honorable COMPTON I. WHITE, Members of the Idaho delegation in Congress."

---

"Senate Joint Memorial No. 4

"To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States Government in Congress assembled:

"We, your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Idaho, do respectfully represent that

"Whereas the residents of the State of Idaho are anxious to assist in every possible way in winning the war and are willing to face obstacles of all types; and

"Whereas the tire rationing program and restrictions on the use of rubber is seriously crippling the production of food and disrupting vitally needed transportation; and

"Whereas the need for prompt development of synthetic rubber is most urgent to promote the successful prosecution of the war effort and alleviate the restrictions now required on travel facilities; and

"Whereas vast supplies of raw products from farm and forest are available for producing synthetic rubber of high quality by known and proven processes: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the State of Idaho (the house of representatives concurring), That we respectfully request that the Congress of the United States of America give the matter of development of synthetic rubber its immediate attention and aid in every possible way the development of the manufacture of synthetic rubber. We further respectfully urge that restrictions now in effect by any and all agencies of the Government, preventing an immediate development of synthetic rubber from any and all sources, be removed by congressional action; and be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Idaho be authorized and he is hereby directed to immediately forward a certified copy of this memorial to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State."

By Mr. JOHNSON of California:

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation:

"Senate Joint Resolution 10

"Joint resolution relative to memorializing the President, the Congress, the Secretary of the Interior, and the War Production Board with respect to the urgency of prompt completion of all units of the Central Valley project

"Whereas the Congress of the United States has heretofore appropriated an aggregate of $149,969,000 for the construction of the Central Valley project, California, and it is estimated that the further sum of $114,031,000 will be necessary to complete said project; and

"Whereas the United States Bureau of Reclamation under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior has for the past 7 years been engaged in constructing said project; and

"Whereas some units of the project are only partially completed, including Shasta Dam, Keswick Dam, the Contra Costa Canal, Madera Canal, and Friant Dam, while work has not even commenced on vital units such as the Delta Cross Channel, the Delta-Mendota Pumping System, and the Friant-Kern Canal; and

"Whereas construction of said Friant Dam on the San Joaquin River has been virtually completed by the United States Bureau of Reclamation except for installation of control gates; and said Friant Dam and Madera and Friant-Kern Canals can be completed enabling beneficial use to be made of waters now going to waste, by the use of a comparativel insignificant amount of strategic materials and expenditure of a relatively small additional appropriation by the Congress, and the necessary machinery and equipment for such construction is now idle and therefore available, the necessary labor, skilled and unskilled, can be obtained without material conflict with the manpower demands of the war program, and, with irrigation water available from said Friant Dam through said canals, said San Joaquin Valley lands will be capable of affording an enormous increase of production of foods, fibers and raw rubber vital to the progress of the war; and

"Whereas the War Production Board has recently ordered cessation of construction of all units of said project except Shasta Dam; and

"Whereas the Great Central Valley of California is now making a contribution to the current war program by the production of essential foods and fibers; and

"Whereas the completion of the Central Valley project by providing sorely needed supplementary water supplies will enable an enormous increase in the production of foods and fibers of which there are now serious shortages throughout the Nation; and

"Whereas completion of the project will make available many thousands of acres peculiarly suited to the growing of guayule, the most feasible source of natural rubber; and

"Whereas on completion the project will afford a source of electric energy which will enable a vast expansion of shipbuilding yards, factories, and other strategic war production plants in California; and

"Whereas all features of the Central Valley project are designed as mutually interrelated, and to fulfill the objectives of the project and to make a material contribution to the war program, it is imperative that the project, including all features thereof, be completed in its entirety: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and the Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California hereby respectfully memorializes and urges the President and the Congress of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior, and the War Production Board that all units of the Central Valley project and all features thereof and particularly those portions thereof positively necessary to aid the war effort be promptly completed, and to that end that the necessary funds, priorities, and materials be made immediately available; and be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of the senate is hereby requested to transmit copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States, to the Secretary of the Interior, and to the War Production Board."

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

"Assembly Joint Resolution 24

"Joint resolution relative to the growing shortage of motortruck transportation

"Whereas the population of the Western States of the United States is thinly spread over an area of 1,508,916 square miles with a railroad trackage of only 41,593 miles; and

"Whereas within the State of California there are 1,868 communities wholly dependent upon motortruck transportation for transportation of necessary foods and other goods to and from their communities; and

"Whereas the State of Oregon has 941 and the State of Washington has 874 such dependent communities; and

"Whereas the delivery of fluid milk to the cities of San Francisco, Los Angeles, Oakland, Sacramento, and Spokane is wholly by motortruck and trailers; and

"Whereas 89.3 percent of fruits and vegetables and 66 percent of the livestock used for food in the city of Los Angeles is transported by motortruck and trailer; and

"Whereas 75 percent of fruits and vegetables and livestock used for food in the city of San Francisco is transported by motortruck and trailer; and

"Whereas 80.6 percent of all interstate motortruck and trailer loads originating in Los Angeles consists of total or partial loads of raw or other war materials transported from or to war manufacturing plants; and

"Whereas the State of California produces annually 30,000,000 tons of farm, ranch, and orchard products which must of necessity be transported to market by motortrucks and trailers during all or some part of its journey to market; and

"Whereas railroads are overburdened in furnishing the transportation needs of the armed forces of the United States during the war emergency, and are not equipped with rolling stock, cars, or locomotives to take over any considerable portion of the transportation of foodstuffs and other supplies heretofore transported by motortrucks and trailers; and

"Whereas new or additional motortrucks or trailers are unobtainable; and

"Whereas thousands of motortrucks and trailers, busses, and farm motorized implements, indispensable for the necessary production and transportation of foods, supplies, and war materials are in disrepair and not in use because needed repair parts or tires cannot be obtained; and

"Whereas motortruck and bus transportation is rapidly becoming difficult or impossible to obtain due to the fewer motor vehicles available for the necessary needs of the people; and

"Whereas any further lessening in the number of motortrucks or trailers available for transportation will paralyze the agricultural and livestock industries of this State and jeopardize the supply of food and the operation of war manufacturing plants; and

"Whereas it is apprehended that because of the conditions aforesaid farmers, fruit and vegetable growers will be hindered in their production of food operations and there will not be a sufficient number of motortrucks and trailers to transport this year's crops of vegetables, fruits, grains, or livestock to market or to transport raw and other materials to and from war production plants: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California (jointly), That the Congress of the United States be and the same is hereby memorialized to appoint a committee to immediately investigate conditions that prevail in the motortrucking industry in the Western States in respect to the procurement of necessary repair parts and tire replacements and to take such other and necessary action in the premises as will relieve and prevent any further disruption of the motortrucking and passenger-bus industry and enable food producers to produce and cultivate their crops and convey the same to markets; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States from California."

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Military Affairs:

"Assembly Joint Resolution 26

"Joint resolution relative to the Pharmacy Corps bill

"Whereas the Pharmacy Corps bill (S. 216; H. R. 997) is now pending in Congress, providing for the creation of a pharmacy corps in the United States Army, to be organized under graduate pharmacists skilled and learned in the compounding and dispensing of drugs and medicines; and

"Whereas in the treatment of disease and the care of the sick or injured the services of skilled, reliable, and experienced graduate pharmacists are essential, and such services are second only to the services of skilled physicians and surgeons; and

"Whereas it is the well-established public policy of the United States and of every State thereof to require all persons engaged in the compounding and dispensing of drugs and medicines to be graduate pharmacists; and

"Whereas such public policy is vital and necessary to the safety, health, and life of its people; and

"Whereas the health, safety, and preservation of life of every member of the armed forces of the United States is of primary and paramount importance for the safety of the Nation; and

"Whereas members of the armed forces of the United States, and especially those of them who are overseas at various fighting fronts, are entitled to receive, and it is the policy and desire of the people of the United States to furnish to them, the best treatment and most proficient services within the power and capacity of the people, and especially to furnish proficient and skillful graduate pharmacists to safeguard the health and lives of its fighting men; and

"Whereas the compounding and dispensing of drugs and medicines is essentially a professional service requiring great skill, intimate knowledge and experience with drugs and medicines: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California (jointly), That the legislature of this State unanimously endorse the Pharmacy Corps bill (S. 216; H. R. 997) and request the Members of Congress to enact the same into law; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly prepare and transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, to each Senator or Member of the House of Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States, and that the Senators and Representatives from California are hereby respectfully urged and requested to support the said Pharmacy Corps bill."

Two joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

"Assembly Joint Resolution 14

"Joint resolution relative to small business enterprises

"Whereas the great majority of manufacturing plants in California are small enterprises with 100 or less employees; and

"Whereas a great many of such small business enterprises have been adversely affected by war conditions; and

"Whereas a large number of such manufacturing plants could readily be converted and adapted to the production of materials, goods, or supplies essential to the war effort; and

"Whereas such conversion and adaptation would materially further the war effort and contribute to national defense: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California (jointly), That the Congress of the United States be memorialized to effectuate the policy of the Smaller War Plants Corporation and aid small business enterprises; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy of the United States be memorialized to distribute military and naval contracts more widely by purchasing in smaller quantities and awarding a proportionate share of such contracts to small business enterprises; and be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Vice President of the United States, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States and to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States, and that the Senators and Representatives of California are hereby respectfully requested to urge such action."

"Assembly Joint Resolution 20

"Joint resolution relative to memorializing the Federal Government to immediately assign a large force of O. P. A. investigators to the city of Vallejo and surrounding communities to enforce the Rent Control Act

"Whereas the city of Vallejo and the surrounding communities form an area occupied largely by defense workers and members of the armed forces stationed at Mare Island; and

"Whereas in spite of large housing projects by Federal agencies, the area is still greatly overcrowded; and

"Whereas such a situation results in difficulty in finding accommodations for families of men in the armed services; and

"Whereas some unscrupulous persons take advantage of the situation to charge unfair rental and food prices, giving unfavorable publicity to a city deep in the war effort and patriotically doing all that is possible for victory; and

"Whereas strict interpretations of the 'freezing' statutes often result in penalizing the fair landlord who has hesitated to raise his rents and is giving more in proportion than the other landlord who was first to raise his rents; and

"Whereas the staff allowed the branch of Office of Price Administration in this district is insufficient to inspect premises and prices to do justice to both landlord and tenant and seller and purchaser: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California (jointly), That the Federal Government be, and is hereby, memorialized to immediately assign a large force to the branch of the Office of Price Administration in the Vallejo area to check rental and food prices and services and to penalize unscrupulous offenders of the Office of Price Administration rules and regulations; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Federal Government be, and is hereby, memorialized to raise the Federal Housing Administration building quotas for the Vallejo and surrounding communities so that patriotic private citizens may do their part to provide further housing accommodations in the area; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly be hereby directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the main office of the Office of Price Administration, to the main office of the Federal Housing Administration, and to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States."

Two joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Commerce:

"Senate Joint Resolution 7

"Joint resolution relative to memorializing and petitioning the Congress of the United States to pass the bill generally known as the Lea-Welch Bill suspending the exemption from tolls in favor of the United States Government traffic over the Golden Gate Bridge during the war emergency and for 6 months thereafter

"Whereas the Golden Gate Bridge, spanning the waters of San Francisco Bay, is an essential link in the highway system of the State of California and an indispensable connection between the United States Army reservations at Forts Baker, Barry, and Cronkhite, Calif., and the Presidio of San Francisco, and between many other military establishments in this State, without which connection the movement of armed forces of the United States would be interrupted and the transportation of soldiers, sailors, munitions, and the implements of war would be rendered almost impossible without the use of Government water transport; and

"Whereas the War Department permit under which the Golden Gate Bridge was erected provides for the passage of all Government traffic free of the payment of all tolls; and

"Whereas, due to the tremendous increase in the size of the armed forces of the United States and the vast increase in Government traffic due to the emergencies of war, the volume of free traffic has swelled to such proportions that it is monopolizing in large part the services of said bridge and has vastly increased the wear and tear thereon, without any return whatsoever to the Golden Gate Bridge and Highway District; and

"Whereas, due to the rationing of gasoline and rubber, the civilian traffic has so decreased that the revenues of said bridge will not meet the expenses of the maintenance and operation of said bridge and the payment of interest and retirement of its bond issue; and

"Whereas said bridge was built out of funds wholly raised by the sale of bonds secured by the revenues of said bridge and the property within the district; and

"Whereas, the present and future existence of the structure depends either upon its operation within the income secured from tolls or the payment of any deficit by the property owners in the counties of San Francisco, Marin, Napa, Sonoma, Del Norte, and part of Mendocino; and

"Whereas the bridge was built through the courage, enterprise, and patriotic spirit of the people of the aforesaid district, and these same property owners are now facing a heavy penalty through the existing financially dangerous condition brought about largely through the lack of tolls from Government traffic; and

"Whereas the failure of the revenues of said Golden Gate Bridge to meet the cost of maintenance and operation thereof would disrupt the traffic situation of the State and the fiscal affairs of the Golden Gate Bridge and Highway District without fault on the part of said district or its management; and

"Whereas there was introduced in the Seventy-seventh Congress a bill numbered H. R. 7667 by Representatives CLARENCE F. LEA and RICHARD J. WELCH, which bill provided that all Government traffic should pay tolls for the duration of the present emergency; and

"Whereas said bill has been reintroduced in the present Seventy-eighth Congress and is of the most vital importance to the people of the State of California and to the highway system of the State of California; and

"Whereas the Government of the United States, through its various agencies, military and civil, is obliged to and does pay tolls for the carrying of its traffic and the transportation of essential men and materials to all privately owned public utilities engaged in the transportation and carrying thereof; and

"Whereas the directors of the bridge district, in compliance with original requests from the War Department at the time the bridge was first planned, generously cooperated in the demands of the War Department for the construction of certain installations and highway improvements running into several hundred thousand dollars more than was at first suggested; and

"Whereas the intent and effect of this measure, if passed, will be a great forward step in correcting what is now recognized as an extremely unfair business relation between the War Department and the bridge district to the serious detriment of the latter; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California (jointly), That the Legislature of the State of California urgently represents to the Congress of the United States that the passage of said bill is a matter of urgent necessity, and it hereby memorializes the Congress to enact said bill in order to prevent penalizing the Golden Gate Bridge and Highway District and the State of California, of which said State the said district is a political subdivision, and to prevent the disruption of the traffic of the State of California and the fiscal system of such Golden Gate Bridge District due to the causes recited in the preamble to this resolution; and be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of the senate is hereby directed to send a copy of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of the Senators and Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States."

"Assembly Joint Resolution 27

"Joint resolution relative to memorializing Congress in relation to retaining the administration of California fishery production in the United States Department of Agriculture

"Whereas the general matter of the control and regulation of the production of foodstuffs in the interest of the prosecution of the war is now vested in the United States Department of Agriculture and is being ably administered by the Secretary of Agriculture, Claude Wickard; and

"Whereas an attempt is being made to transfer the jurisdiction of production of the California fisheries to another agency of the Federal Government; and

"Whereas the production of food, regardless of the nature thereof, is all one subject and the administration of matters relating to food production should be and remain centralized in one agency: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California (jointly), That the President and the Congress of the United States be and they hereby are memoralized and requested to take no steps which would result in the transfer of the administration of the production of the California fisheries to any agency other than the Department of Agriculture of the United States; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly is directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to each Member in the Congress of the United States from California, and to Claude Wickard, Secretary of Agriculture of the United States."

Two joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Finance:

"Assembly Joint Resolution 22

"Joint resolution relative to memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States to amend the Federal Social Security Act in respect to earnings and other income of recipients of old-age assistance

"Whereas the provisions of the Federal Social Security Act now in effect relating to grants to States for old-age assistance require the State agency, in determining need, to take into account any other income and resources of an individual claiming old-age assistance; and

"Whereas it is the desire of the Legislature of California to make adequate provision for the senior citizens of the State and to allow them to earn and receive incidental income in a reasonable amount without deduction thereof from the amount of aid allowed them, and without jeopardizing their right to receive old-age aid; and there are many legislative bills now pending before the Legislature of California to accomplish these results, consideration of which necessarily awaits action by the Congress and the President of the United States; and

"Whereas it is the consensus of the members of the Legislature of California that provision of adequate assistance to the senior citizens of the State is one of the most important subjects before the Legislature of California at this fifty-fifth regular session of the legislature: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California (jointly), That the Congress and President of the United States are hereby memorialized to amend the Federal Social Security Act in such manner as to permit the States to allow their senior citizens to earn and receive other income in such sum as the President and the Congress may deem proper, without deduction from the amount of old-age aid which would otherwise be allowed them, and without affecting their eligibility to receive aid; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly is hereby directed immediately to send copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States."

"Assembly Joint Resolution 23

"Joint resolution relative to memorializing Congress to enact Senate bill 450 regarding compensation to civilians

"Whereas the United States is engaged in a total war and many civilians are patriotically contributing their services in such necessary activities as civilian defense work; and

"Whereas many of these civilians, including the civilian defense workers, may be injured and become burdens on their families or society unless provision is made to protect them from financial loss caused by such injuries; and

"Whereas the members of the Legislature of the State of California believe that the Federal Government should make provision to protect these citizens rendering invaluable service to our country: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California (jointly), That the Congress of the United States be memorialized to enact Senate bill 450, introduced by Senator PEPPER, which provides for compensation to civilians including civilian defense workers; and be it further

"Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to the Senators and the Representatives from California."

A joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Montana; to the Committee on Finance:

"House Joint Memorial 1

"Joint memorial to the Congress of the United States requesting the amendment by that body of the Social Security Act of Congress so as to provide for the payment by the Federal Government of social security to city, county, and State officers and employees, and school teachers

"To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

"Whereas, the Social Security Act of Congress makes no provision for the payment to city, county or State officers or employees: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the Twenty-eighth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana (both houses concurring), That the Congress of the United States of America be, and it is hereby respectfully urged to amend the Social Security Act in such manner as to provide for the payment by the Federal Government of adequate social security to city, county, and State officers and employees, and school teachers, and thus place them in a position of equality with industrial and other employees; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this memorial be mailed by the secretary of state to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Montana."

(The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a memorial identical with the foregoing, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.)

A substitute for House Joint Memorial of the Legislature of the State of Montana; to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

"Substitute for House Joint Memorial 3

"Joint memorial to the President and the Senate of the United States of America, setting forth the wishes of the Twenty-eighth Legislative Assembly of Montana, relative to the winning of the war by the total defeat of the Axis Powers, and relative to post-war settlements affecting the peace and stability of our country and of the world, and asking the President and the Senate, as the treaty-making power in our country, to fully recgnize and accept our national duty and responsibility in the reestablishment and future maintenance of world peace and order

"To the President and the Senate of the United States:

"Whereas young men from Montana are for a second time in a generation fighting and dying on foreign soil for the freedom and security of our Nation; and

"Whereas the people of our State, mindful of the fact that a nation as large and as powerful as the United States of America will find it impossible to maintain a policy of complete isolation in a world in which distances are being cut down every day by continually improving means of transportation and communication, and hopeful that in the peace to follow our certain victory that our country will, together with the other nations, accept its full share of responsibility in the reorganizing and rebuilding of the post-war world and the safeguarding of world peace; and

"Whereas, realizing that the new problems our Nation will face in its task of helping to establish and maintain a just and durable peace may require certain sacrifices, a high devotion to the cause of world peace, a united effort on the part of all citizens of the Nation, and a determination to insist on the maintenance of a free and stable order in the world, regardless of race or religion: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Twenty-eighth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, in regular session assembled, the senate and house concurring, do respectfully and earnestly urge upon the President and the Senate of the United States, our firm conviction that our war effort should not stop short of the total military defeat of all the Axis Powers, our belief in the vital need of our country's full cooperation and responsibility, with the other United Nations, in reestablishing order after the present war; in the maintenance of peace in the many countries where civil law has been wiped out during this war, and in the necessary use of international policing or such other means as may be required to keep such peace: In the readjustment of treaties with other nations so the world trade and commercial needs and possibilities may be encouraged and developed to the mutual benefit of all nations and peoples; and in the necessity that our country accept this inevitable change in our world relations, and enter upon such new policy with the courage and determination characteristic of the United States of America, and with a full confidence in the eventual solution of the principal problems ahead, to the end that American principles may benefit the rest of the world, and strengthen and fortify here at home those same principles of economic and political democracy which we so deeply cherish; be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this memorial be transmitted by the secretary of state of Montana to the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, to the Honorable Senate of the United States, to the Members of Congress from the State of Montana, and to each of the legislative assemblies of the several States of the United States of America."

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Montana; to the Committee on Immigration:

"House Joint Resolution 3

"Resolution to the Congress of the United States to initiate proper action and legislation to determine the identity, and forfeit the citizenship of those holding a dual citizenship in any other country and prohibiting such citizenship

"Whereas the war in which the United States is engaged has focused attention upon certain traitorous and disloyal elements in the citizenship of this country which have used their technical citizenship as a cloak behind which to promote and carry out these disloyal designs; and

"Whereas attention has also been focused on nationals, of foreign countries, who have regarded their primary and real loyalty to the country of their origin and their American citizenship as only a necessary convenience in better securing the material and political advantages which this great Nation holds forth; and

"Whereas these elements have been weakening factors in the unified body of loyal American citizens believing in the traditions and principles of the American democracy; and

"Whereas an outstanding evidence of the existence of these elements has been the acceptance of a dual citizenship status by acknowledging allegiance to the sovereignty of their native country particularly among the Japanese, German Bundists, and Italian Fascists; and

"Whereas foreign countries have held forth such dual citizenship status for their nationals in this country for the purpose of retaining their sovereignty and jurisdiction over said nationals and for the purpose of commanding their loyalty and obedience in peace and in war; and

"Whereas this war has made us aware of the necessity of scrutinizing more carefully our citizenship in order that by infiltration of disloyal elements our democratic processes are not perverted from their original purposes and used against our own interests; and

"Whereas the safety and protection of the American democracy requires the immediate weeding out of said disloyal elements and the forfeiture of, and exclusion from, American citizenship of those nationals of other countries practicing dual citizenship or for whom dual citizenship is held out: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of Montana (jointly), That the Congress of the United States be, and the same is hereby memorialized to institute proper action and legislation: (1) to determine the identity of those persons in this country of Japanese ancestry or otherwise subscribing to citizenship, or making themselves amenable to the sovereignty of any other country; (2) to forfeit the American citizenship of such persons, and (3) to prohibit any person now or heretofore holding or exercising a dual citizenship from being or ever becoming an American citizen; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded by the secretary of state to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States from Montana."

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota; to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

"House Concurrent Resolution C

"Whereas a Nation-wide rationing system has been established for the purpose of conserving and distributing various commodities vital to our war effort or made scarce by war conditions; and

"Whereas the administration of the ration program is established at one point in every county, and the application blanks and questionnaires being used are of such form that it is almost impossible for most people to complete them by mail; and

"Whereas farmers are handicapped by distance from the county rationing office, lack of time, and in many cases lack of complete information: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the senate concurring), That we recommend to the Office of Price Administration that:

"1. A local board be established in each town for the purpose of receiving applications in connection with the rationing program, also empowered to act in emergencies;

"2. That necessary forms be simplified and made as few as possible;

"3. That farmers be given special consideration in the rationing of gasoline, tires, and other materials necessary in the production of food and raw materials so vitally needed in the war;

"That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the administrative heads of the national and State Office of Price Administration and to each of the Members of Congress of this State."

A concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota; to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

"House Concurrent Resolution V

"Concurrent resolution memorializing Congress and the President to authorize the Indians to elect their Commissioner of Indian Affairs and other administrative officials and that treaty rights and claims be promptly adjudicated and paid

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the senate concurring therein):

"Whereas the Indian Americans who have loyally been serving their country and ours, both in the armed forces and elsewhere, have long been under practically complete domination of the Indian Bureau, with no voice in the administration of tribal property and affairs, and have witnessed, without power to effectively protest, the building up of a vast array of life-term employees, very few of whom are Indians, paid from tribal funds or a charge against tribal property and other resources; and

"Whereas rights, as assured by treaties and legislation, have, in too many instances, not been adjudicated and the Indians reimbursed for their property, neither financially nor by larger, more profitable allotments of lands and equipment; and

"Whereas on the Standing Rock Sioux Indian reservation, near our capital city, magnificent new brick buildings have been erected at Fort Yates for administrative offices and housing employees, with many Indians living the year around in poor tents, without coal, sufficient clothing or food, and sickness so prevalent that the agency hospital facilities are wholly inadequate: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we believe in preserving the personal and property rights of the Indians, of whom there are nearly 10,000 in our State, and commend their loyalty, and that we recommend to Congress and the President that the Indians, as citizens and voters under the act of June 2, 1924, be authorized to vote for and elect their own Commissioner of Indian Affairs and other administrative officials; and be it further

"Resolved, That all tribal and personal rights and claims, as evidenced by treaties otherwise, be promptly adjudicated and paid; and be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of State of North Dakota send copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives, the North Dakota Members of Congress, and to the secretaries of state of the States of Minnesota, South Dakota, Montana, Wisconsin, Kansas, Oklahoma, Wyoming, and Washington for the attention of their respective legislative assemblies."

Two concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

"HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION E

"Whereas during the past 25 years the economy of the Nation has been so fundamentally based on rubber that unless rubber is immediately forthcoming the Nation's economy is doomed to a disruptive break-down which will drastically curtail the all-out war effort, and endanger ultimate victory.

"For the past year high officials of our Government have been attempting to make synthetic rubber out of petroleum. From the best information available, 33 rubber plants have been authorized, all with the Standard Oil Co. and members of their patent pool. Grants have been made by Jesse Jones, head of Reconstruction Finance Corporation, providing all necessary funds to the extent of a half a billion dollars or more.

"Since this arrangement has been made, plants have reached only the blueprint stage. One or two plants may be in operation by 1944. From the time that has elapsed since the construction of these plants was authorized, without results, it is self-evident that the making of synthetic rubber is still in the experimental stage and that the experience so far has been in the wrong direction.

"The Russian Government has successfully been making all of their rubber for the last 10 years or more, and they offered to this Government over a year ago their formula for making synthetic rubber out of agricultural products. Nothing has been done to take advantage of this.

"The Gillette committee findings of last year established the fact that plants for making rubber out of agricultural products can be built with one-third of the amount of critical materials required by the petroleum plants and one-third of the cost in about one-half of the time. That at this time we have a surplus of certain agricultural products, all of them containing carbohydrates. In fact, rubber can be made from anything that grows out of the ground, including waste products.

"Whereas it appears that no results are apparent at this time from the action that has been taken by the Government to make synthetic rubber. Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the senate concurring), That we ask the reintroduction of the Gillette bill and its immediate passage, so that speedy arrangements may be made for the building of plants to make rubber from agricultural products as well as from petroleum products so as to assure an adequate supply of synthetic rubber to be used in winning the war, and to insure the all-out war effort and speedier victory by preventing the disruptive break-down of our national economy; now be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to each Member of Congress from North Dakota, including both Senators and Representatives, Mr. GILLETTE, of Iowa, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House, the President of the United States, Mr. Jeffers, Rubber Administrator, Jesse Jones, and to the Speaker of the House and President of the Senate of the States of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Montana, Oklahoma, Texas, Missouri, Illinois, Michigan, South Dakota, and Colorado."

"House Concurrent Resolution 1

"Whereas the farmers in this country are called upon to contribute to the war effort by an increase in production of farm products; and

"Whereas the expense for farm labor, machinery, repairs, and all other items entering into the over-all cost of the production of agricultural products has greatly increased; and

"Whereas war industries are permitted to include the cost of labor, as well as all other costs, plus profit, in determining the total cost of materials and equipment for the purposes of war; and

"Whereas food is one of the main essentials and is absolutely necessary for the winning of the war, and the farmers of this country are engaged in an all-out effort to win this war; and

"Whereas the farmers of this country cannot successfully carry on unless they receive a reasonable profit for their agricultural products; and

"Whereas they are now being discriminated against to the advantage of labor and industry; and

"Whereas there is now before the Congress of the United States a bill for the establishment of prices for agricultural products which will include the cost of labor and other costs, and will give to the farmer a return upon the basis of parity: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the senate concurring), That we earnestly recommend that the Congress of the United States, as quickly as is possible, pass and enact into law such measure or measures as may be necessary to return to the farmer such prices for all agricultural products as will assure to him a reasonable profit over his cost of production, including all cost of labor; be it further

"Resolved, That a copy of this resolution, under the seal of the State of North Dakota, be transmitted by the secretary of state to each Member of Congress from North Dakota, Vice President of the United States, Speaker of the House of Representatives, Secretary of the United States Department of Agriculture, chairmen of the Committee on Agriculture in the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and the president of the senate and speaker of the house of representatives in the States of Montana, South Dakota, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Colorado, Oklahoma, Michigan, Texas, Missouri, Illinois, and Indiana."

PROPOSED NAVY YARD IN NARRAGANSETT BAY—RESOLUTION OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF RHODE ISLAND

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference a resolution of the Rhode Island General Assembly, adopted by both houses and signed by the Governor, proposing, first, that a United States navy yard be created in Narragansett Bay; second, that the outer line of defense, inclusive of Gay Head, Block Island, and Montauk Point, be completely fortified.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate Resolution 67

Resolution proposing (1) that a United States navy yard be created forthwith and completely equipped within Narragansett Bay and (2) that the outer line of defense, inclusive of Gay Head, Block Island, and Montauk Point be completely fortified immediately as nationally necessary

Whereas the great strategic importance of the Narragansett Bay area, together with the region contiguous thereto, constitutes a potential asset of inestimable value, both in peacetime as well as in wartime, to the whole United States, inasmuch as it can and should be completed as a powerful protector of New York City and harbor, and then would, when so completed become of vital consequence to the security of each of the 19 States within the northeastern part of the United States lying east of the Mississippi River and north of Tennessee and North Carolina, which area contains approximately 60 percent of the population and 80 percent of the industry and wealth of the United States, and that this is emphasized by the fact that at least 50 percent of the imports and exports of this northeastern area pass through the port of New York and, consequently, if New York were injured, the whole northeastern area might be seriously crippled, to the great detriment of the whole United States; and

Whereas within the Narragansett Bay area and region are already located many naval and military establishments and facilities, such as the Northeastern Naval Air Base at Quonset Point, the naval torpedo station, the naval training station, the Naval War College, the naval fuel depot at Melville, the PT boat basin, the PT officers' training school, the naval hospital, ammunition storage depots, naval supply depots, naval housing projects, the inner line of defense, and numerous interior and surrounding forts and antiaircraft gun installations and that these, in the aggregate, could constitute a valuable nucleus of a permanent United States naval operating base, and that it is necessary to the best interests of both the United States of America and the State of Rhode Island that all these establishments and facilities be kept in being and fully effective, during the war and during the peacetime to follow; and

Whereas the Narragansett Bay area does not now possess a United States navy yard, nor is the outer line of defense in existence which line would comprise a fortified Gay Head, a fortified Block Island, and fortified Montauk Point, and which outer line of defense, when in existence, would protect the outer ship lane to and from New York and would also protect Block Island Sound, Buzzards Bay, and the southern approach to Cape Cod Canal and the eastern entrance to Long Island Sound, and that, unless and until these facilitie are created, the Narragansett Bay area and region will not be fully effective either as a protector of New York and the northeastern part of the United States, aforesaid, or as a United States naval operating base, since it will lack a necessary United States navy yard capable of building, repairing, and servicing ships of all categories; and

Whereas without a navy yard it is practically certain that, when the war is over, many of the existing naval and military establishments and facilities, enumerated above, will be dismantled or placed on reduced, skeletonized operation as happened following the World War No. 1, and thus the United States would then be deprived of vitally important and valuable assets and the industries of the State of Rhode Island would then greatly suffer, but that, on the other hand, if a modern, fully equipped United States navy yard be located in the Narragansett Bay area, all of the existing wartime establishments and facilities would become adjuncts to the United States navy yard and be coordinated therewith and this coordinated whole would then become of permanent value, available for full use during peace as well as in war: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, That in view of the foregoing facts, unqualified support is hereby given to the proposal that a completely equipped United States navy yard, capable of building, repairing, and servicing ships of all categories, be at once created within Narragansett Bay, and unqualified support is hereby given to the additional proposal that the outer line of defense, inclusive of Gay Head, Block Island, and Montauk Point, be completely fortified and, therefore, hereby urge upon the Government of the United States that the creation of these proposals be undertaken immediately as nationally necessary; and, be it further

Resolved, That a printed copy of this resolution, duly certified, be sent forthwith by the secretary of state of Rhode Island to each of the following: The President of the United States of America; the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of War, the chairman of the United States Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, the chairman of the United States House Committee on Naval Affairs, the chairman of the United States Senate Committee on Military Affairs, the chairman of the United States House Committee on Military Affairs, the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States, the Governor of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations.

RESOLUTIONS OF GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF NORTH CAROLINA

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I present two petitions in the form of resolutions from the General Assembly of North Carolina, with the letters transmitting them.

I ask that the resolutions and the letters be printed in the body of the RECORD and appropriately referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

To the Committee on Banking and Currency:

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Raleigh, February 18, 1943.

Hon. JOSIAH W. BAILEY,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BAILEY: By direction of our general assembly, I take pleasure in enclosing herewith copy of House Resolution No. 492, recently passed as indicated.

With kindest regards and best wishes, I am,

Yours for victory soon,

THAD EURE,
Secretary of State.

"House Joint Resolution 492

"Joint resolution to petition the Office of Price Administration to adjust fairly the price of milk to be paid to the farmer

"Whereas the Office of Price Administration has temporarily frozen milk prices on the farm level at the prices prevailing during the month of January 1943; and

"Whereas the ratio between the price of milk and the cost of feed and labor was very unfavorable at that time to the producers and is now even more unfavorable; and

"Whereas the Office of Price Administration in fixing ceilings on feed manufacturers, warehousemen, handlers, and dealers has provided for reasonable margins of profits; and

"Whereas 56 herds of dairy cattle have already been sold in North Carolina and many other dairymen are seriously contemplating sale because milk prices are insufficient to cover mounting feed and labor costs; and

"Whereas North Carolina is a milk deficient State and imports more than 2,000,000 pounds of milk per month; and

"Whereas any decrease in milk production in North Carolina will necessitate increased shipment of milk into the State and further burden transportation facilities; and

"Whereas this order will result in a decrease in milk production in North Carolina far below present demands and further aggravate the growing food shortage: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring):

"SECTION 1. That the Office of Price Administration be requested to reconsider their action and either rescind the order or fix milk prices at the farm level high enough to cover all feed and labor costs and allow a reasonable margin of profit.

"SEC. 2. That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Honorable James F. Byrnes, Director of Economic Stabilization, the Honorable Claude R. Wickard, Secretary of Agriculture, the Honorable Prentiss Brown, Director of the Office of Price Administration, and to each Senator and Representative from North Carolina in the National Congress, with the request that our Senators and Congressmen do everything possible to get the Office of Price Administration to reconsider this action and get this matter adjusted before it is too late."

To the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

NORTH CAROLINA GENERAL ASSEMBLY,
SENATE CHAMBER,
Raleigh, February 20, 1943.

Hon. JOSIAH W. BAILEY,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BAILEY: I am enclosing copy of a resolution passed by the General Assembly of North Carolina asking that the Nation be put back on standard time during the winter months and hope some action may be taken before the winter of 1943 sets in.

At the council of State governments held in Baltimore in January, a survey revealed that the new war time slows production, causes absenteeism in important war industries, disrupts the domestic, industrial, and commercial life of the Nation. It forces families to stagger meal hours where adults work and children go to school, thus adding to the problem of share-the-ride transportation. In North Carolina this new wartime has caused a decline in the school enrollment of 25,000 pupils. The wartime schedule is bad enough during the summer months, so we do petition you to make a change back to standard time during the winter, if you do not see your way clear to advocate a complete change for the year round.

Thanking you for giving your attention to this, I am,

Very truly yours,

LEE B. WEATHERS,
Chairman, Federal Relations Committee.

"Whereas the Congress of the United States has seen fit to enact legislation redefining standard time, and to put into effect daylight saving or wartime, as a method of saving electric power and speeding the war effort by moving the hands of the clock forward 1 hour in each of the time zones of the United States; and

"Whereas the advanced time does not seem to speed the war effort in any material degree, but on the other hand has disrupted our domestic and industrial life in North Carolina causing a loss in production in our industrial plants by workers being late in reporting for duty, especially during the winter months; and

"Whereas the new time schedule has disrupted the domestic life, causing parents who work and children who attend school to observe different hours, in their eating and working; and

"Whereas school attendance in North Carolina shows a decline of approximately 40,000 under last year, most of which decline is due to the unwillingness of rural parents to allow their children to venture on lonely roads before daylight to meet the 4,800 rural school busses, now restricted to travel on designated routes as a means of conserving tires and gasoline: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of North Carolina (the house of representatives concurring):

"SECTION 1. That the General Assembly of North Carolina does hereby petition the Congress of the United States to enact amendatory legislation so as to redefine standard time in the manner in which it was defined before congressional legislation provided for daylight saving or wartime, and especially that wartime not be used during winter months when the disruption, discomforts, and disadvantages are greatest in our industrial, domestic, and agricultural endeavors.

"SEC. 2. That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the North Carolina congressional delegation and to the President of the United States, Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt.

"SEC. 3. That this resolution shall be in full force and effect from and after its ratification."

RESOLUTIONS BY NATIVE SONS OF THE GOLDEN WEST, COMPTON AND SAN DIEGO, CALIF.—JAPANESE UNIT OF THE ARMY

Mr. STEWART presented resolutions adopted by Compton Parlor No. 273, of Compton, and San Diego Bay Parlor No. 267, of San Diego, both of the Native Sons of the Golden West, in the State of California, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Compton Parlor No. 273 of the Native Sons of the Golden West is grieved and shocked to learn of the proposal to enroll in the United States Army a unit composed of so-called "citizens of the United States of America of Japanese ancestry."

The members of Compton Parlor are firmly of the opinion that the Constitution of the United States of America does not confer citizenship on any person of Japanese descent born in this country; therefore, there are no "citizens of the United States of Japanese ancestry"; they also are of the belief that all Japanese, regardless of protestations otherwise, inherently are loyal only to Japan, and they are thoroughly convinced that the enrollment of a United States Army unit composed of Japanese will be inimicable to the welfare of the State of California and the Nation, and will undoubtedly create a dangerous threat to a proper and adequate defense of this country: Therefore

Resolved, That Compton Parlor is strenuously opposed to the formation of a Japanese unit of the United States Army, and hereby respectfully petitions the Congress of the United States of America to exercise its prerogative and nullify the declared intention of the War Department to organize and enroll such a unit; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this petition be sent the Secretary of War, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Chairman of the Senate Military Affairs Committee, the Chairman of the House of Representatives Military Affairs Committee and others.

A. R. TARLETON,
President.
F. J. SMITH,
Secretary.

The members of Santa Monica Bay Parlor, No. 267, of The Native Sons of the Golden West are grieved and shocked to learn of the proposal to enroll in the United States Army a unit composed of men of Japanese ancestry.

The members of Santa Monica Bay Parlor are firmly convinced that the enrollment of a United States Army unit composed of Japanese will be inimicable to the welfare of the State of California and of the Nation, and will create a dangerous threat to a proper and adequate defense of this country. Therefore be it

Resolved, That Santa Monica Bay Parlor, No. 267, of The Native Sons of the Golden West is strenuously opposed to the formation of a Japanese unit of the United States Army, and hereby respectfully petitions the Congress of the United States of America to take such steps as may be necessary to prevent the organization and enrollment of such a unit. And be it further

Resolved, That copies of this petition be sent to the Secretary of War, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the chairman of the Senate Military Affairs Committee, the Chairman of the House of Representatives Military Affairs Committee, and others.

THE RUML TAX PLAN—PETITION

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I present a petition signed by K. A. Henn and 59 other residents of Springfield, Vt., with respect to "the current income-tax situation" and in favor of the so-called Ruml plan. I should like to have the RECORD note the fact that the petition has been sent to me, and I ask that it be referred to the appropriate committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

WORKERS DRAWING UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I present a letter from Chairman Altmeyer of the Social Security Board showing that in the average week of January 1943, there were 213,910 workers who were drawing unemployment insurance benefits. On the basis of a 48-hour week, this would represent a loss in excess of 10,000,000 manpower hours per week at a time of critically severe manpower shortage. The Social Security Board is investigating the reasons for this situation. Any judgment should be withheld pending a disclosure of the facts; but I respectfully suggest that this exhibit should be included in any manpower shortage investigations which Congress makes. Therefore, I ask that this letter be printed at this point in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL SECURITY AGENCY,
SOCIAL SECURITY BOARD,
Washington, D. C. February 15, 1943.

Hon. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG,
United States Senate, Washington D. C.

DEAR SENATOR VANDENBERG: The War Manpower Commission has referred to us your letter of February 6 requesting information on the number of workers currently drawing unemployment-insurance benefits. The following figures indicate the number of individuals who, in the average week during January 1943, received unemployment-insurance benefits under each of the States systems:

|---|---|
| Alabama | 5,970 |
| Alaska | 20 |
| Arizona | 180 |
| Arkansas | 1,090 |
| California | 13,200 |
| Colorado | 220 |
| Connecticut | 1,170 |
| Delaware | 300 |
| District of Columbia | 700 |
| Florida | 3,170 |
| Georgia | 3,780 |
| Hawaii | 60 |
| Idaho | 120 |
| Illinois | 29,890 |
| Indiana | 6,420 |
| Iowa | 1,420 |
| Kansas | 1,220 |
| Kentucky | 2,830 |
| Louisiana | 3,560 |
| Maine | 1,920 |
| Maryland | 2,910 |
| Massachusetts | 5,760 |
| Michigan | 9,190 |
| Minnesota | 3,100 |
| Mississippi | 1,270 |
| Missouri | 7,710 |
| Montana | 240 |
| Nebraska | 520 |
| Nevada | 60 |
| New Hampshire | 640 |
| New Jersey | 12,310 |
| New Mexico | 90 |
| New York | 51,880 |
| North Carolina | 3,700 |
| North Dakota | 190 |
| Ohio | 5,530 |
| Oklahoma | 1,190 |
| Oregon | 550 |
| Pennsylvania | 11,450 |
| Rhode Island | 1,850 |
| South Carolina | 2,060 |
| South Dakota | 140 |
| Tennessee | 6,190 |
| Texas | 1,360 |

| Virginia | 1,590 |
| Washington | 830 |
| West Virginia | 1,540 |
| Wisconsin | 2,220 |
| Wyoming | 50 |
| Total, all States | 213,910 |

We are currently making a study in collaboration with the United States Employment Service and the several State unemployment compensation agencies as to the reasons why the individuals enumerated above are receiving unemployment compensation benefits. Preliminary analyses in a few States have indicated that the group now receiving unemployment compensation benefits is made up in considerable part of older persons, and particularly older women, in addition to those workers who are receiving benefits while in the process of moving from one job to another.

Sincerely yours,

A. J. ALTMEYER,
Chairman.

DISTRESS AMONG LIVESTOCK FEEDERS

Mr. MOORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred a telegram which I sent concerning the livestock feed shortage in the State of Oklahoma and the reply thereto, disclosing a very critical situation. I ask that the telegrams be referred to the appropriate committee with the hope that some relief may be afforded at an early day.

There being no objection, the telegrams were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEBRUARY 24, 1943.

CHICKASHA COTTON OIL CO.,
Chickasha, Okla.:

Complaints concerning cottonseed feeds in Oklahoma indicate acute distress among stockmen, both dairy and beef cattle. Will you please wire me whether this shortage of feed is approaching exhaustion?

I would like to have your information based upon not only your immediate knowledge but from what knowledge you can acquire from other sources of supply.

E. H. MOORE.

---

CHICKASHA, OKLA., February 24, 1943.

E. H. MOORE,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

Answering your wire, to my definite knowledge there is immediate and acute distress among all classes of livestock feeders, including beef and dairy and hog and sheep, due to shortage of cottonseed products, which are not approaching but have reached vanishing point. Relief must come quickly as critical period at hand and will extend to April 15, when pasture will afford relief. However, feeding program will suffer unless stocks are also made available in smaller quantity during summer feeding period. My office importuned daily by scores feeders pleading for relief. This especially critical period as cattle usually just maintained on winter ration and not too thrifty.

L. C. HUTSON,
President, Chickasha Cotton Oil Co.

PAY-AS-YOU-GO TAX PLAN—RESOLUTION FROM CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF KANSAS CITY, MO.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri presented a resolution adopted by the National Affairs Committee and concurred in by the board of directors of the Chamber of Commerce of Kansas City, Mo., which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL INCOME TAXES FROM SALARIES, WAGES, AND DIVIDENDS SHOULD BE COLLECTED CURRENTLY

Be it resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of Kansas City approves in principle the Ruml plan of collecting Federal income taxes from individuals receiving salaries and wages, and bringing the collection of such taxes to a current basis, rather than the present method of collecting in the year following that in which the income was received. If necessary, drastic action should be adopted that will bring collections to a current basis without imposing 2 years' taxes in 1 year.

With many workers employed in war plants at abnormally high wages, it is believed labor, capital, and the United States Treasury will be benefited by withholding taxes from such wages at rates of 10 percent to 12 percent above a uniform exemption. The payment of dividends to stockholders by corporations should be subjected to similar rates of withholding taxes during war time.

The exemption should be on the same level for the taxpayers regardless of the status of the taxpayer regarding salary, wages, or dividends, with the final adjustment being made when the individual files his return at the end of the calendar year. To levy withholding taxes on a base exemption that differs with the marital status, or number of dependents of the taxpayer, would work an intolerable burden on employers and corporations making distributions of dividends.

The chamber favors the adoption of a plan that will bring the imposition of Federal individual taxes on salaries, wages, and dividends to a current basis, even though Congress finds it impracticable to adopt the Ruml plan in its entirety. It is unalterably opposed to any method that will impose at the same time income taxes for both a current year and a prior year.

RESOLUTIONS OF CHAPEL HILL (N. C.) CONSUMERS ASSOCIATION—CONSUMERS' REPRESENTATION ON ECONOMIC STABILIZATION BOARD

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask that there be printed in the body of the RECORD resolutions unanimously adopted by the members of the Chapel Hill Consumers Association, Chapel Hill, N. C., on Friday, January 29, 1943, in the town hall. I ask that the resolutions be accompanied by a letter addressed to the President by Mr. Harvey Lebrun, a member of the board of directors of the Chapel Hill Consumers Association, under date of February 4, 1943.

There being no objection, the letter and resolutions were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHAPEL HILL CONSUMERS ASSOCIATION,
Chapel Hill, N. C., February 4, 1943.

Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: At a meeting of our association last Friday, in the town hall, our members voted unanimously to join the American Association of University Women in urging you to add a consumer representative to the Economic Stabilization Board. On that Board, you will recall there are two representatives each for labor, management, and farm interests, but none for organized consumers. The Government representatives on the Board, of course, represent us all, and properly so, but they hardly fill the requirements for consumer representation as such. Most of the earlier agencies that were given control over economic processes have had consumer representatives as such, and it is our view that the considerations which led to those appointments are doubly important in the Economic Stabilization Board. For, although no other group has a greater stake in stabilization, no economic interest is more likely to be overlooked than that of unorganized, and unrepresented, consumers—a situation which can be corrected only by having spokesmen of such consumers as are organized participate along with the representatives of producer groups in the formulation of national directives that affect their common interests.

As Dr. McHale, of the American Association of University Women stated in her letter to you on this matter, "At no time have the citizens of this country been so conscious of their problems as consumers, so well organized, so well informed and articulate, and so ready to participate responsibly in developing sound policies." This widespread concern on the part of organized consumers means that consumer representatives on the Economic Stabilization Board would have a large, informed body of consumers on whose experience they could draw in contributing the consumer viewpoint.

Enclosed is a copy of the resolutions we passed on this matter. We trust that you may yet give them favorable consideration and thus help to carry out the basic democratic principle that groups whose interests are most involved should participate in the governmental and quasi-governmental bodies that make decisions and determine policies affecting those interests. Such action would not only insure the best service to the Nation by the Board, through the resulting balanced consideration of all aspects of the problems with which it will deal, but it will strengthen national morale by giving evidence to the great mass of people who are conscious of their needs and responsibilities as consumers that they will have spokesmen on the Board through whom their voice may be heard and their wishes made known. As Donald Montgomery writes of the wartime food administration (in the current Survey), "Let us in on the job. We want to help carry the load. Some thirty million or more of us stand to go hungry if the job isn't done (properly). We want to be in there pitching when the farm bloc threatens to highjack our grocery bill, or to push the dirt farmer off the production line. We want to be on hand when any selfish interest (whether labor or capital) puts the heat on to grab something for itself out of this war at our expense."

Sincerely yours,

HARVEY LEBRUN,
Member of the Board of Directors,
Chapel Hill Consumers Association.

---

Resolved by the members of the Chapel Hill Consumers Association in meeting assembled:

1. That this association herewith goes on record as in favor of the maximum practicable cooperation and participation of organized consumers in the conduct of Government services that greatly affect the interests of consumers;

2. That we join the American Association of University Women in petitioning President Roosevelt to appoint a consumer representative on the Economic Stabilization Board, since no other economic interest has a greater stake in stabilization and no interest is more likely to be overlooked than that of unorganized and unrepresented consumers.

Resolved further, That copies of these resolutions be sent to the President of the United States, to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, to the chairmen of the appropriate committees of Congress, to James F. Byrnes, Director of the Economic Stabilization Board, to the director general of the American Association of University Women, and to the press.

SENATOR FROM TENNESSEE—DISMISSAL OF PETITION OF JOHN RANDOLPH NEAL

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, as chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections I desire to make a report on a complaint which was made by one John Randolph Neal, of Tennessee, contesting the election of TOM STEWART to the office of United States Senator. On February 4 the complaint was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The charges made by the contestant were fully considered at a meeting of the committee, and as a result it was unanimously voted that it be recommended to the Senate that nothing was presented casting any doubt on the election of the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. STEWART] and that the petition should be dismissed.

I therefore submit the report of the committee (Rept. No. 63) which sets forth the complaint in full and the conclusions of the committee, and I ask unanimous consent that the resolution I am now reporting, carrying out the recommendation of the committee, be immediately considered, and I ask that it be agreed to and the complaint dismissed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution reported by the Senator from Rhode Island will be read for the information of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 110) was read as follows:

Resolved, That the contest of John Randolph Neal against TOM STEWART, Senator from the State of Tennessee, be, and the same is hereby, dismissed.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, is this a resolution from the Committee on Privileges and Elections?

Mr. GREEN. It is.

Mr. WHITE. Did the minority members of the committee assent to the report?

Mr. GREEN. They did, every one. The minority was well represented at the meeting which recommended dismissal of the petition. The motion was made by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES]. Every member of the committee present voted for the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

INSPECTION OF JAPANESE RELOCATION CENTERS IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, some days ago the Senate adopted a resolution authorizing the Committee on Military Affairs to make an investigation of the relocation camps where Japanese are concentrated at this time. There was an oversight on the part of those in charge of the measure in that the words "accompanied by one investigator" were omitted.

I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the original resolution which I report from the Committee on Military Affairs, which would merely give us the privilige of inserting the words I have just read in a previous Senate resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none, and the resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The resolution (S. Res. 111) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Senate Resolution 101, authorizing inspections of the Japanese relocation centers in the United States, agreed to on February 11, 1943, be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting after the word "committee", in line 3, a comma and the words "accompanied by one investigator", so that as amended the resolution will read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs, or any subcommittee thereof duly appointed by the chairman of the committee, accompanied by one investigator, hereby is authorized to visit for the purposes of inspection, during the present session of Congress, the Japanese relocation centers in the United States, the expenses incurred in pursuance thereof, not to exceed $3,000, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

INVESTIGATION OF COMMODITY PRICES IN THE DISTRICT

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report favorably Senate Resolution 23, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 23) submitted by Mr. NYE January 7, 1943.

The resolution had previously been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with an amendment, on page 2, line 15, to strike out "$3,000" and to insert "$1,000", so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete investigation of commodity prices prevailing in the District of Columbia, with a particular view toward determining how prices paid by consumers for agricultural commodities, or for commodities processed or manufactured in whole or substantial part from agricultural commodities, compare with the prices received by farmers for such agricultural commodities. The committee shall report to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the results of such investigation, together with its recommendations, if any, for necessary legislation.

For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Seventy-eighth Congress, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses, and the production of such correspondence, books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $1,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 88) submitted by Mr. DOWNEY February 1, 1943.

The amendment of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate was, on page 2, line 11, to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$1,000", so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete study and investigation with respect to (1) the existing shortage of labor in the Pacific Coast and Rocky Mountain States and its effect upon the efficient and successful prosecution of the war effort, and (2) methods of relieving such shortage. The committee shall report to the Senate as soon as practicable, the results of its study and investigation together with its recommendations, if any, for legislation.

For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the Seventy-eighth Congress, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such correspondence, books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures, as it deems advisable. SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO STUDY AND SURVEY PROBLEMS OF AMERICAN SMALL BUSINESS ENTERPRISES—LIMIT OF EXPENDITURES

AMENDMENT OF THE SELECTIVE SERVICE ACT—EXEMPTION OF MARRIED MEN WITH CHILDREN

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I introduce a bill to amend the Selective Service Act by exempting married men with children.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask that the bill be printed in the RECORD in full.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 763) exempting certain married men who have children from liability under the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940, as amended, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of the Selective Training and Service Act of 1940, as amended, is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(m) Every registrant who was married prior to December 8, 1941, who has maintained a bona fide family relationship with his family since that date, and who has a child or children under 18 years of age, shall be exempt from training and service under this act."

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I may say that in introducing this bill I am in no way seeking to interfere with the armed forces of the United States, but an Executive order has been issued deferring all single men who are over the age of 38, even though they may be physically fit.

Physically fit men between the ages of 38 and 45 years have been deferred. I appeal to the ordinary common sense of the Members of the Senate and the people of the country, and submit that a single man between 38 and 45 who is physically fit or a physically fit married man who has no children should be taken before married men with children are taken. The result of taking married men with children is to break up many homes in America, and in many instances to force the married women who are left to go to work in factories, and oblige them to have their children raised in institutions.

Mr. President, we are talking about preserving the American way of life; we are talking about preserving the American home; yet when married men with children are taken in preference to single men between the ages of 38 and 45 and married men without children—and that is being done now—it results in breaking up the home life of many families. That will result not only in destroying the morale of our people, but everyone knows that it will destroy the morals of the people. It also will deprive many children of the care and education they should have.

Mr. President, I submit that we should place in the law a provision exempting married men with children. If in the defense of the United States and our institutions, after all physically fit men have been taken, it becomes necessary to amend such a provision, then those in authority can come to Congress and ask that the law be changed, and we can change it. In the meantime no married man with children should be taken.

Mr. WHEELER subsequently said: Mr. President, a few minutes ago I made a statement on the floor with reference to deferments. I now ask unanimous consent that there be printed in the RECORD as a part of my former remarks with reference to the bill a special cable to the New York Times. It states that the bill amending the National Security Act by removing all restrictions on use of the militia outside of Australian territory was defeated in the Australian House of Representatives. This is the third time that has happened.

There being no objection, the dispatch was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of February 25, 1943]

AUSTRALIANS DEFEAT SERVICE AMENDMENT—HOUSE KILLS BILL TO FREE MILITIA TO FIGHT ANYWHERE

CANBERRA, AUSTRALIA, February 24.—The bill amending the National Security Act by removing all restrictions on use of the militia outside of Australian territory was defeated in the House of Representatives this afternoon on a motion for the first reading, 34 to 29.

In accordance with a decision reached by the opposition at a meeting earlier in the day the bill was introduced by A. W. Fadden, as requested by opposition senators.

In agreeing that Mr. Fadden should sponsor the bill the opposition decided not to withdraw Speaker W. M. Nairn and the chairman of the committee, J. H. Prowse, from their posts to give the opposition its maximum voting strength because it was known at least two opposition members would not support the bill.

Mr. Nairn offered to resign to vote for unrestricted militia service, but the offer was declined on the ground that in the absence of a solid party vote the sacrifice of the speakership would be meaningless.

A bill defeated on first reading may be revived at any time.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I have received this morning and present for appropriate reference a House joint memorial from the State Legislature of Montana, which I had not seen previous to the time I drafted the bill I have just introduced. The memorial reads as follows:

House Joint Memorial 5

A joint memorial to the President and the Congress of the United States and to War Manpower Commissioner Paul V. McNutt protesting the uncertainty of the economic status of the men now under provisions of the draft law and urging Congress of the United States to enact proper legislation to amend the present Selective Service Act and requesting War Manpower Commissioner Paul V. McNutt to establish by executive order a uniform system for inducting married men with children into the armed forces

To the President of the United States and to the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled and to War Manpower Commissioner Paul V. McNutt:

Whereas there has existed no uniform policy for the drafting of men in the armed forces by the selective service; and

Whereas such policy has caused much uncertainty of the economic status of the men now under the provision of the draft law; and

Whereas married men in Montana were drafted long before married men were drafted in many other States; and

Whereas in the Associated Press report of January 19, of an interview with War Manpower Commissioner Paul V. McNutt, the uncertain status of married men with children still exists; and

Whereas we citizens of Montana do not wish a repetition of the above conditions by having our married men with children drafted in the armed forces before all available manpower in the previous classification has been drafted in the other States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Twenty-eighth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana (the senate concurring), That we respectfully urge the Congress of the United States to enact proper legislation to amend the present Selective Service Act by creating a national pool of manpower for the purpose of selection of men into our armed forces and that War Manpower Commissioner Paul V. McNutt be urged by Executive order to establish in the meantime a uniform system of draft as between the various States; be it further

Resolved, That no State shall be required to send married men with children into the armed forces until all States shall be uniformly required to do likewise; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded by the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives, to the President of the United States, to the Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Montana.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The memorial presented by the Senator from Montana will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

(The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution identical with the foregoing, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.)

JOINT COMMITTEE TO STUDY, ANALYZE, AND EVALUATE REQUESTS FOR APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I introduce a bill entitled "A bill to establish a joint committee of Congress to conduct studies, make analyses of and evaluate requests for appropriations." In introducing this bill I call to the attention of the Senate the fact that we have set up numerous committees, the most notable one being the so-called Byrd committee, which have delved into various activities of the Federal Government and have given us most illuminating and valuable information.

However, a number of committees have directly or indirectly operated along the same line. It is perfectly obvious that if any reductions in expenditures are to be made, and if efficiency in the administration and disbursement of money is to be obtained, the Appropriations Committees of the House and Senate are the forum and the place where such policies will be debated and such action as is possible will be taken.

Members of the Senate and the House will rely on those two committees primarily for economy. I think it has been pretty well demonstrated that the Appropriations Committees do not have all the information they should have in passing on the appropriations for departments, bureaus, and so forth. Therefore, the bill I have introduced provides that the Appropriations Committees shall have a joint staff of trained experts who shall all through the year examine into the various ramifications of our governmental machinery, and be in a position to advise the appropriations committees where there is inefficiency, where there is extravagance, and where economy can be effected. If we do that, it will be economy in itself, because it will be a continuing operation, and it will obviate appropriation by the Senate and House of funds for numerous committees more or less operating in the same field.

It has been my experience, from being the chairman of one of these committees, that the experts in the Comptroller General's department as a whole are very efficient and able men, who can give very valuable information, and if the bill is enacted into law I should like to see the force largely recruited from the General Accounting Office.

Mr. President, when the head of a bureau or of a department employing thousands of persons, comes before the Appropriations Committee asking for money, we are not in a position to elicit from him the detailed information we should have. The only way we can get it is by having a joint committee of Congress, which even between sessions of Congress could conduct surveys at the request of the Appropriations Committees, and, when appropriation bills come before us, give us information thereon—whether or not automobiles used by various departments are too numerous, whether questionnaires are too numerous, whether office space is being wasted, whether machinery is being wasted, whether necessary functions are not being performed, and so forth, and so on.

Mr. President, I ask that the bill be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks. It may need some alterations and corrections. I had it drawn in consultation with the experts of the Comptroller General's department. I hope Senators will read it. Inasmuch as the bill deals with appropriations by the Congress I respectfully suggest that it be referred to the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 764) to establish a joint committee of Congress to conduct studies, make analyses of and evaluate requests for appropriations, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby established a permanent joint committee of Congress to be known as the Joint Committee on Appropriations, which shall have authority (a) to make such investigations and studies as may from time to time, in its opinion, appear necessary to determine the necessity for, propriety of, and other incidents surrounding, requests made upon the Congress for appropriations of funds; (b) to undertake such investigations and studies as may be directed by either of the Committees on Appropriations of the Senate or House of Representatives; (c) to make such investigations and studies, and reports thereon, as shall be ordered by either the Senate or House of Representatives, or by any committee of either which has jurisdiction over revenue, appropriations, or expenditures; (d) to require any department, establishment, or agency in any branch of the Federal Government to furnish such information regarding its powers, duties, activities, organization, financial transactions, and methods of business as it may from time to time require of them; and (e) its staff, when duly accredited by the committee (to be evidenced by credentials validated by its chairman), shall, for the purpose of securing information set forth under (d) hereinbefore, have access to and the right to examine any books, documents, papers, reports, or records of any kind of any such department, establishment, or agency of the Federal Government: Provided, That the reports on investigations and studies initiated by the Joint Committee on Appropriations may be made public by the chairman thereof when in his opinion such would be in the public interest: Provided further, That the Joint Committee on Appropriations, when directed by either the Senate or House of Representatives or any committee thereof to render reports to them on certain matters, shall maintain such reports confidential unless otherwise directed.

SEC. 2. (a) The Joint Committee on Appropriations shall consist of seven members. Three members shall be appointed from each of the Committees on Appropriations of the Senate and House of Representatives by the respective chairmen of such committees, and the chairman shall be appointed from either of the said Committees on Appropriations by mutual agreement of the chairmen of such committees: Provided, That should the chairmen of the said Committees on Appropriations fail to appoint a chairman of the Joint Committee on Appropriations within 30 days after the effective date of this act, or within 30 days after a vacancy occurs in such position, then the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall appoint a chairman from the remaining membership of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives.

(b) The members of the Joint Committee on Appropriations, including the chairman, shall continue as members thereof so long as they continue as members of their respective Committee on Appropriations or until their successors are appointed. The respective chairmen of the Committees on Appropriations of the Senate and House of Representatives shall, on the last day of a Congress, appoint members of their respective committees who have been reelected to the succeeding Congress to fill any vacancies which may then be about to occur on said Joint Committee on Appropriations, and such appointees and the members of said committee who shall have been reelected shall continue until their successors are chosen.

(c) The Joint Committee on Appropriations shall, when Congress is not in session, exercise all the powers and duties devolving upon said committee as provided by this act, the same as when the Congress is in session.

SEC. 3. The Joint Committee on Appropriations is authorized to employ a staff of investigators, analysts, attorneys, accountants, or such other professional or clerical employees as may be necessary from time to time to competently execute its undertakings. The staff (a) shall be headed by a chief of staff appointed by the committee with compensation not to exceed $9,000 per annum; (b) the chief of staff shall employ and fix the compensation of such staff members and other employees as may be authorized by the committee and, when authorized by the committee, shall purchase such office equipment, books, stationery, and other supplies as may be necessary for the proper performance of the duties of the committee and as may be appropriated for by the Congress; (c) the chief of staff, staff members, and other employees are authorized to perform such travel as may be directed by the chairman of the committee and they shall be reimbursed for necessary traveling expenses and subsistence expenses in accordance with the provisions of the Subsistence Act of 1926, as amended, and regulations issued pursuant thereto governing the executive departments and establishments.

SEC. 4. The Joint Committee on Appropriations and its staff members shall have the same privilege of free transmission of official mail as the executive departments of the Federal Government.

SEC. 5. The Joint Committee on Appropriations shall make an annual report to the Congress on the first day of each regular session and such report shall be a public document.

SEC. 6. There are authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary for the operation of the Joint Committee on Appropriations and such appropriations shall be disbursed by the disbursing clerk of the Senate.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. NYE. I am delighted to find the Senator from Maryland sponsoring legislation of the sort proposed in the bill. I remind the Senator that at the beginning of the present session of Congress the minority members of the Senate Appropriations Committee and of the House Appropriations Committee joined in a legislative effort very much along the line suggested by the Senator from Maryland. I simply wish to request, since the matter is being presented for study, that the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 2) which was submitted at the opening of the present session may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 2) is as follows:

[78th Cong., 1st sess.—S. Con. Res. 2—In the Senate of the United States, January 18, 1943, Mr. NYE (for himself, Mr. BRIDGES, Mr. LODGE, Mr. HOLMAN, Mr. WHITE, Mr. GURNEY, Mr. BROOKS, Mr. BURTON and Mr. REED) submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations]

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there is hereby created a joint congressional committee known as the Joint Committee on Budgetary Control (hereinafter referred to as the joint committee).

SEC. 2. (a) The joint committee shall be composed of 10 members, as follows: (1) 5 members who are members of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, 3 from the majority and two from the minority party, who shall be chosen by the majority and minority members of such committee, respectively; and (2) 5 members who are members of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, 3 from the majority and 2 from the minority party, who shall be chosen by the majority and minority members of such committee, respectively.

(b) No person shall continue to serve as a member of the joint committee after he has ceased to be a member of the Committee on Appropriations by which he was chosen, except that the members chosen by the House of Representatives Committee on Appropriations who have been reelected to the House of Representatives shall continue to serve as members of the joint committee notwithstanding the expiration of the Congress.

(c) The members shall serve without compensation in addition to that received for their services as Members of Congress; but they shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in the performance of the duties vested in the joint committee, other than expenses in connection with meetings of the joint committee held in the District of Columbia during such times as the Congress is in session.

SEC. 3. The joint committee shall elect a chairman and vice chairman from among its members.

SEC. 4. The joint committee shall have power to appoint and fix the compensation of a clerk and such experts and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants as it deems advisable.

SEC. 5. The expenses of the joint committee shall be paid one-half from the contingent fund of the Senate and one-half from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, upon vouchers signed by the chairman or vice chairman.

SEC. 6. For the purposes of this concurrent resolution, the joint committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit and act at such times and places within the United States, whether or not the Congress is in session, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, and to take such testimony, as it deems necessary, to authorize such expenditures as may be necessary for printing, binding, and other purposes as may be authorized by the joint committee. Subpenas may be issued under the signature of the chairman of the joint committee or any member designated by him, and may be served by any person designated by the chairman or such member. The chairman of the joint committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses. Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by authority of said joint committee or any subcommittee thereof, willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any questions pertinent to the matter herein authorized, shall be held to the penalties provided by section 102 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended (U. S. C. 1940 ed., title 2, sec. 192). The cost of stenographic services in reporting such hearings as the joint committee may hold shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words.

SEC. 7. It shall be the duty of the joint committee to investigate the operation and effects of the present budgetary system, to ascertain the necessity for, the economy, and the correctness of amounts of appropriations made to or requested by the various governmental departments, independent agencies, and establishments, and to make such other investigations with reference to the expenditure of public funds as it may deem necessary, and in particular to investigate such questions as may be submitted to it by the Appropriations Committee of the Senate or House of Representatives, or by any member of the joint committee, and to report, from time to time, to the Appropriations Committees of the Senate and House of Representatives the results of its investigations, together with such recommendations as it may deem advisable.

SEC. 8. The joint committee shall make available to the Appropriations Committees of the Senate and House of Representatives and to the subcommittees thereof at the request of the chairman or ranking minority member of committees or subcommittees thereof all available data together with the services of experts and assistants on the staff of the joint committee.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I think the request made by the Senator from North Dakota is appropriate. I may state to the Senator that I believe all bills and resolutions tending to accomplish the same result should be considered by the Appropriations Committee of the Senate at an early date. The bill I introduced was prepared last November at the conclusion of the work of the so-called Tydings committee. The only reason it has not been introduced before this time is that the persons in the office of the Comptroller General who have been cooperating with me have been making a study as to how the best service can be performed for the least money.

As the Senator from North Dakota knows, the Brookings Institution also has made a survey of appropriations made by Congress. The institution has recommended for our consideration the setting up of a joint staff such as the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Committee on Ways and Means of the House have on the subject of taxation. That has proved to be a very valuable adjunct of Congress.

Mr. President, if this policy is written into the law, it will, in my humble opinion, save money in the Senate and in the House, and perhaps save countless millions of dollars throughout the Government. It will put all persons involved on notice that we are not only appropriating money, but that we, as the appropriating arm, insist that the money not be wasted, but be spent efficiently; and if it is not spent efficiently, our experts will so advise us, and we can provide for such economies as the evidence may warrant.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I am sure there will be full and free cooperation in the Appropriations Committee on the subject to which the Senator from Maryland refers, and if we can accomplish our purpose I think we can save the taxpayers of the United States endless hundreds of millions of dollars annually.

Mr. TYDINGS. I may suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that he knows, as I know, that we have had a great many committees working more or less along the same line. If such a policy as that proposed were adopted, it would not be necessary to have so many such agencies. The authority for making the appropriations begins with the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. NYE. Certainly.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Appropriations Committee should make these investigations and elicit the information, so that we may make economies in the committee in line with the information obtained.

LOANS FOR MINERAL DEVELOPMENT PURPOSES IN TIME OF WAR—WITHDRAWAL OF MOTION TO RECONSIDER

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, on the last call of the calendar Senate bill 12 came before the Senate for consideration and was passed. Later the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RADCLIFFE] entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which it was passed. Inasmuch as the bill was sponsored by the senior Senator from Nevada, I have taken up the matter with the Senator from Maryland. I now am authorized by the Senator from Maryland, who could not be on the floor this morning, to ask that the motion to reconsider be withdrawn. I so request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator again indicate the bill to which his remarks are directed?

Mr. McCARRAN. Senate bill No. 12, which had to do with the question of the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in regard to mines producing strategic and war essential minerals. Let me say to the Senator from Maine that an attempt was made to amend the bill on the floor of the Senate and then to recall it. The Senator from Maryland now requests that his motion to reconsider be withdrawn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the motion to reconsider is withdrawn.

THE TREATY-MAKING POWER—PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, complying with the requests of scores of communications which I have received, I introduce three alternative joint resolutions on the subject matter of an amendment to the Constitution dealing with the treaty-making powers. The subject matter is, of course, within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Foreign Relations. However, because of the legal aspects involved, I suggest to the Chair that the joint resolutions be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, so that the same subcommittee may have charge of the entire investigation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the joint resolutions will be referred as requested by the Senator from Iowa.

The joint resolutions were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

S. J. Res. 36. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the making of treaties;

S. J. Res. 37. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the making of treaties; and

S. J. Res. 38. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relating to the making of treaties.

FUNCTIONS OF THE WAR SHIPPING ADMINISTRATION—AMENDMENTS

Mr. BAILEY submitted several amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 133) to amend and clarify certain provisions of law relating to functions of the War Shipping Administration, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

CONFIRMATION OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES RECEIVING COMPENSATION OF $4,500 OR MORE PER ANNUM

Mr. O'MAHONEY submitted an amendment in the nature of a substitute intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 575) to provide that officers in the executive branch of the Government who receive compensation at a rate in excess of $4,500 a year shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, in the manner provided by the Constitution, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills were each read twice by their titles and referred as indicated:

H. R. 1670. An act to amend section 2 of the Civilian Pilot Training Act of 1939, as amended; to the Committee on Commerce.

H. R. 1692. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with the construction of certain public works, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

CONFIRMATION BY SENATE OF CERTAIN FEDERAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, it is my observation that there is considerable misunderstanding in the country regarding to so-called McKellar bill, which I would not support in normal times, but which I believe to be absolutely indispensable in these abnormal times, if Congress shall be in a position to respond to the country's demand that the taxpayer shall be protected against the pay roller. I have set down my own conception of the issue in a letter to the editor of the Bay City (Mich.) Times, which I ask to have printed at this point in the RECORD:

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEBRUARY 16, 1943.

The EDITOR,
Bay City Times, Bay City, Mich.

DEAR SIR: I have just read your interesting editorial of February 10th entitled "Not Very Convincing" and referring to the pending McKellar bill requiring Senate confirmation of Federal employees receiving $4,500 a year. You state that this measure "does not seem to have any more than nuisance value" and that "MCKELLAR, VANDENBERG, and the others would do well to forget about this unwise and pickayunish piece of legislation."

Without in any way intending to complain about the editorial I want to respectfully suggest that there is considerable misunderstanding about this McKellar bill; and for the sake of whatever light it may throw upon the subject, I want to make the following observations.

In normal times I have always opposed the confirmation principle involved in the McKellar bill for the very good reasons (which you point out) that the exercise of this Senate veto on personnel may easily become a mere instrument of partisan patronage and political "pie counter" tactics. But under the abnormal conditions which we now confront I want to suggest that this possible infirmity sinks into relative insignificance compared with the far larger public service to be rendered by this process of scrutiny. The war requires us to establish many new and vast bureaus. The nature of this emergency requires that these bureaus shall have large discretionary power because the subsequent nature of their swiftly changing responsibilities cannot be anticipated. Thus, lump-sum appropriations frequently become unavoidable. Yet the country rightfully wants Congress to hold these bureaucrats to "strict accountability" for their expenditures to the end that every possible needless public expense shall be avoided. I may add that I personally believe this to be a primary obligation upon every Member of Congress. Under existing abnormal circumstances there is no way that this Congressional check can be exercised except as the new positions thus created and their personnel are submitted to the Senate for confirmation. In my view this goes to the very heart of the country's right to legitimate protection against extravagant and wasteful bureaucracy.

I respectfully call your attention to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for February 15 at page 942 where the following colloquy occurred:

"Senator VANDENBERG. Then the practical effect would be that the Manpower Administrator can name whom he pleases to whatever position he wishes to create, at approximately whatever salary he desires the employee to receive, within the rather loose general framework of the civil-service law and the Classification Act?

"Senator WALSH. I believe that to be true."

With this set of facts in mind, I now respectfully call your attention to my own further comments at page 943, as follows:

"Senator VANDENBERG. I have no desire to interfere in any way with the personnel of the War Manpower Commission. I do not want to have anything to do with the selection of any nominee or employee which the Manpower Commission may have. I agree that, under the circumstances, broad discretionary powers must be allowed. I also agree that in the first instance lump-sum appropriations must be made for personnel. But since this is the war system under which we must operate there should be at least one point where these positions when created should pass in review before the Senate. I know of no possible way in which that may be done except by the enactment of the McKellar bill and that is why I am in favor of it."

I call your attention to the language thus used. I am asserting that these "positions" should pass in review. That has nothing to do with patronage. It has no relationship to senatorial interference with appointments (even though this could result as a by-product). It has solely to do with the protection of the public purse and with a practical congressional check upon this sprawling bureaucratic personnel which is rapidly becoming an intolerable burden upon the American taxpayer. I may be wrong, but I know you will welcome this statement of what I believe to be the facts regarding a matter which is bound to become increasingly controversial. I respectfully submit that any "pie counter" which might be persuasively argued against the McKellar bill in normal times is far outweighed by the indispensable need of this congressional audit in abnormal times.

Cordially and faithfully,

A. H. VANDENBERG.

GOVERNMENT OF PUERTO RICO

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] has introduced a bill dealing with Puerto Rico. That bill is now on the Senate Calendar. The Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Ickes, under whose general jurisdiction the administration of affairs of Puerto Rico naturally falls, has written me a letter commenting on the Vandenberg bill fixing the term of the Governor of Puerto Rico. I think it would be in the interest of orderly procedure if the letter of the Secretary were printed in the RECORD for the information of Senators who may care to read it.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 27, 1943.

MY DEAR SENATOR TYDINGS: I should like to express my deep concern with S. 40, and to ask that you take steps to see that it is recommitted to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs. The primary and immediate purpose of the bill has been made clear by its sponsor, Senator VANDENBERG. This purpose is to accomplish the removal of the present Governor of Puerto Rico. So understood, the bill raises a number of grave issues of policy and of constitutional power. These issues cannot adequately be explored within the confines of a letter. But I shall attempt here to epitomize the more outstanding objections to the bill in its present form.

1. The bill was reported favorably by the committee 14 days after its introduction. No hearings were held. Neither this Department nor the State Department was asked to give its views, although this Department has jurisdiction over Puerto Rico and although the State Department is charged with the responsibility for our international policy. The views of none of the interested departments were obtained. The people of Puerto Rico had no opportunity to make their position known to the committee. I am informed that for a long time no substantial change in any of the organic acts relating to our Territories has been proposed by a committee of the Congress except after full discussion and hearings. That normal procedure is especially necessary with a measure so controversial and so punitive as S. 40.

2. I do not think that it is necessary in this letter to discuss the details of the administration of the government of Puerto Rico by Governor Tugwell. But this much should be said. The grave problems of Puerto Rico have challenged American statesmanship for many years. The Governorship of Puerto Rico has always been a most difficult position to fill. There has been sharp controversy with respect to the administration of Governor Tugwell's predecessors and doubtless will be with respect to that of his successors. With respect to the administration of Governor Tugwell, it is worth noting that both houses of the legislature have passed resolutions approving the Governor's administration. In addition, the insular government has received a memorial expressing similar approval signed by more than 314,000 Puerto Ricans. In view of this evidence that Governor Tugwell is supported by a majority of the Puerto Rican voters, although not by the most vocal segment of the population, S. 40 might well appear, to the people of Puerto Rico and to the majority of the insular legislature, to be an expression by the Congress of the United States of a disapproval of an administration which has the support of the majority of the people. However, the issues presented by this bill are more profound and far-reaching than the administration of any single Governor.

3. S. 40 does not seem to me to have been framed with due regard to our responsibilities in the Caribbean or to our developing relations with Latin America. These peoples would most certainly examine with critical care our professions of a "good neighbor" policy, and our announced acceptance of principles of self-determination, if the Congress were summarily to remove a Puerto Rican Governor who is supported by a majority of the island population. I need not emphasize that this is a time of war and a period of developing territorial and colonial policies among the United Nations, and that we cannot afford to sow seeds which might ripen into a suspicion of the motives which lie behind our territorial and insular policies.

4. If S. 40 were enacted, it would serve to make untenable the position of future Governors of Puerto Rico. With the precedent of a legislative removal of Governor Tugwell, the future Governors would hesitate long before they risked criticism by a highly vocal minority of the population. Yet if they avoided this danger, they unquestionably would be subjected to equally bitter criticism by the majority of the Puerto Rican population. I think that Congress should proceed with great caution before it places the Governorship of Puerto Rico in so unfortunate a dilemma.

5. Even if there were in fact grounds of policy pointing to the desirability of removing Governor Tugwell, I must state most emphatically that the Constitution vests this responsibility in the President and not in the Congress.

It needs no argument to establish that the Governor of Puerto Rico exercises purely executive functions and that his removal by any means other than impeachment is a purely Executive responsibility. Senator VANDENBERG, in introducing this bill, recognized both that his objections to Governor Tugwell did not rise to the level which would warrant impeachment and that there was precedent for a rejection of any legislative recommendation to the President for an Executive removal. S. 40 was proposed as "the answer to this dilemma" (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 37). I conceive that the issue thus reduces itself to whether the device of terminating the office of an executive officer, when coupled with a change in the duration of his term, is anything different from a legislative removal.

It seems to me to be plain enough that S. 40 does undertake to remove Governor Tugwell from office. It provides categorically that "the term of office of the Governor of Puerto Rico * * * shall expire 60 days from the date of the enactment of this act." I do not see how words could be plainer, or that the expiration of a man's term of office by force of legislative enactment differs in the slightest degree from removing him from his office by command of the legislature. The effect of this removal is not, as the committee's report suggests, changed or minimized by the possibility that Governor Tugwell might be renominated by the President. This he could do in the event of any legislative removal, save only one done through the constitutional method of impeachment.

I enclose a brief which shows in detail the reasons why S. 40 violates the constitutional requirement of a separation of powers, and the constitutional prohibitions against legislative punishment of an individual.

Even had the committee proceeded with full deliberation, and even had it held full hearings at which Governor Tugwell could defend himself, S. 40 would still be a proposal for unconstitutional action by the Congress. However, I might in this connection observe that I do not see that the committee protects itself from the charge of acting without a hearing by noting that the Governor may have a hearing before the committee in the event that he should be renominated by the President. A judge would not be warranted in entering a verdict of guilty upon receipt of an indictment because the accused might later make a motion for a new trial. Whether or not Governor Tugwell should receive a hearing by the Senate through a renomination, the fact would remain that under S. 40 he would have been removed from office without a hearing.

6. The ostensible purpose of S. 40 is to provide a 4-year term of office for the Governor of Puerto Rico. This is a matter which is, of course, wholly within the power of the Congress. But, even here, I urge upon you that the committee should consider with great care some of the issues involved in this proposal.

The first provision for a Governor of Puerto Rico provided that he should serve for a term of 4 years. (Act of April 12, 1900, sec. 17, 31 Stat. 81.) In 1910, President Taft recommended that the governor hold office at the pleasure of the President. Secretary of War Dickinson, testifying in support of this amendment, explained that this was desirable in order to prevent disorganization of the insular administration as the close of the term draw near. (Hearings, House Committee on Insular Affairs, on bill to amend organic law of Porto Rico, 61st Cong., p. 24.) This recommendation was adopted by Congress and constitutes the present law. (Act of March 2, 1917, sec. 12, 39 Stat. 955; 48 U. S. C. sec. 771.)

It seems to me to be of crucial importance that, if at this time any change should be made in the form of the government for Puerto Rico, any move which is made should be a plain and unmistakable step in the direction of a democratization of the insular government. The people of Puerto Rico would inevitably believe that any change in the governorship which Congress should now provide would represent its best and its ultimate judgment on the nature of that office. This would be a bitter disappointment to a large proportion of the Puerto Ricans and could not but lead to dissolutionment, confusion, and to a loss of confidence in the United States.

I repeat that this is a time of war and a period of transition in the colonial policies of the United Nations. Puerto Rico and the world have been given reason to look to the United States for an enlightened leadership in Territorial and colonial policy. Instead of furnishing such leadership, this bill expresses the policy of the United States to be one which directs the removal of a Governor who has been endorsed by a majority of the people of Puerto Rico. This will seem, not only to the people of Puerto Rico, but to the world, that the Congress of the United States does not propose to move in the direction of further democracy and self-determination for the Territories of the United States. The effect of S. 40 upon the delicate balance of international policy would seem to me to be most serious.

I cannot express too earnestly my profound hope that S. 40 will not pass, or that you may see fit to have this bill recommitted to your committee for a more careful study of its grave questions of Territorial and insular policy and of constitutional power.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD L. ICKES,
Secretary of the Interior.

Hon. MILLARD E. TYDINGS,
United States Senate.

MEMORANDUM ON THE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF SENATE 40

This bill provides that the term of office of the Governor of Puerto Rico shall expire 60 days after the enactment of this act and at the end of each 4-year period thereafter. Fourteen days after the bill was introduced it was reported favorably by the Senate Committee after an executive session. No hearings were held.

Senator VANDENBERG, when introducing S. 40, indicated that he hoped in this way to escape the ordinary limitations upon legislative removal of executive officers. He recognized that his objections did not rise to the level which would warrant an impeachment proceeding; he recognized that the President might, as did President Coolidge, reject as an invasion of Executive power a congressional recommendation for executive removal; and he recognized the unfairness of attaching a rider to an appropriation bill. S. 40 was proposed as "the answer to this dilemma." (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 37.)

It is true that S. 40 understakes to oust Governor Tugwell from his position through a different method than any of the other alternatives, but this is not sufficient to save its constitutionality. S. 40 would be valid only if its purpose and effect did not include a legislative removal of the Governor. Senator VANDENBERG made its purpose wholly plain. The language of S. 40 is equally clear. It provides that "the term of office of the Governor of Puerto Rico * * * shall expire 60 days from the enactment of this act." It is indisputable that S. 40 if enacted would serve to remove the Governor from office 60 days thereafter. There is no such justification for this removal as would exist, for example, were the Governor to be chosen in a different manner, as by election by the Puerto Ricans. S. 40 is, therefore, in the boldest form a legislative removal of the Governor of Puerto Rico. As such, the bill violates fundamental principles of the Constitution.

I. S. 40 CIRCUMVENTS THE IMPEACHMENT PROVISIONS OF THE CONSTITUTION [1]

The power to remove an executive officer of the Government is exclusively in the President of the United States. It is a power coincidental with the power to appoint. The power to remove is not a legislative power; [2] the only way in which the legislature can remove an executive officer of the Government is through impeachment,[3] and only for [2] Meyers v. United States (272 U. S. 52); Humphrey's Executor v. United States (295 U. S. 602).

[3] Art. I, sec. 3, of the Constitution provides: "The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose they shall be on oath or affirmation. * * * And no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Members present."

the reasons specified in the Constitution.[4] The whole purpose of impeachment is to punish public officials for misconduct in office. The crimes for which they may be removed are well defined. Impeachment is limited to high crimes and misdemeanors.

Under impeachment proceedings the officer is given his day in court. He is informed of the charges made against him and is permitted to meet them. All impeachments must originate in the House of Representatives, and are tried by the Senate, whose Members are seated on oath or affirmation, and two-thirds of the Members of the Senate present must concur before a conviction can be obtained.

No impeachment charges have been brought against Governor Tugwell, and S. 40 is an attempt to impeach him by an indirect method which would, if successful, wholly circumvent the impeachment process. It is not to be thought that the framers of the Constitution would have taken such elaborate pains with the impeachment clause had they supposed Congress could by this device so simply remove an executive officer.

II. S. 40 VIOLATES THE FUNDAMENTAL CONSTITUTIONAL PRINCIPLES OF SEPARATION OF POWERS

The powers of each of the three principal departments of government are, under the Constitution, separate and apart and each is free from the control or coercive influence, direct or indirect, of each of the other two. Indeed, the Members of the First Congress for this reason eliminated a phrase from the bill creating the Department of State, which declared that the President alone could remove the principal officer of the Department. This was done, because the Congress recognized that the power to remove was inherent in the Executive, and it did not, therefore, wish to insert a provision which would imply that the executive power to remove was delegated to the Chief Executive by legislative authority.[5]

James Madison, in urging this action, said: "If there is a principle in our Constitution, indeed in any free constitution, more sacred than another, it is that which separates the legislative, executive, and judicial powers. If there is any point in which the separation of the legislative and executive powers ought to be maintained with great caution, it is that which relates to officers and offices."[6]

The President is charged with the responsibility of taking care that all of the laws of the United States are faithfully executed.[7] Therefore, the President has the power to choose those persons in whom he has the greatest confidence and those who, in his opinion, will most ably facilitate in the discharge of that responsibility. Governor Tugwell has been appointed to such a position of trust. His appointment was affirmed by the Senate and his character and fitness passed upon in accordance with law. And, so far as the adequacy of his performance is concerned, it may be noted that his administration has been commended by a resolution passed in both houses of the Puerto Rico Legislature,[8] and by a memorial signed by more than 314,000 American citizens residing in Puerto Rico.[9] Should the Governor fail in his duty, the President and the President alone has the power to remove him. Removal of an executive officer is, under elementary principles, an executive and not a legislative function.

At one time it was argued that by virtue of its power to confirm, the Senate could exercise a certain measure of control over removal. But as to this Chief Justice Taft, in Myers v. United States, decided in 1926, said: "When a nomination is made, it may be presumed that the Senate is, or may become, as well advised as to the fitness of the nominee as the President, but in the nature of things the defects in ability or intelligence or loyalty in the administration of the laws of one who has served as an officer under the President are facts as to which the President, or his trusted subordinates, must be better informed than the Senate, and the power to remove him may, therefore, be regarded as confined, for very sound and practical reasons, to the governmental authority which has administrative control. The power of removal is incident to the power of appointment, not to the power of advising and consenting to appointment, and when the grant of the executive power is enforced by the express mandate to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, it emphasizes the necessity for including within the executive power as conferred the exclusive power of removal."[10] And for the Congress "* * * to draw to itself * * * the power to remove or the right to participate in the exercise of that power * * * would be to infringe the constitutional principle of the separation of governmental powers."[11]

This basic proposition of our constitutional law is established not only by a decision of the Supreme Court but has also been recognized by Presidents Cleveland, Wilson, and Coolidge.[12] Text writers, jurists, and scholars all concur.[13] It has also the approval of Congress; for when the Organic Act[14] of Puerto Rico came before the Senate for consideration, Senator Shafroth, of Colorado, chairman of the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, in his report,[15] recommended that the provision of the bill which authorized the Governor of Puerto Rico to be selected "from the elected members of the Senate and House of Representatives" of Puerto Rico be amended to authorize the President of the United States to nominate the appointee for that post. "This amendment," he said, " is deemed necessary in order to establish in Puerto Rico the principle of separation of legislative and executive departments which has proved so successful in our country."

It seems, then, entirely plain that S. 40, in undertaking to remove Governor Tugwell from office, violates long-settled principles that only the executive branch of the Government has power to remove an executive officer.

III. S. 40 VIOLATES THE CONSTITUTIONAL PROHIBITION AGAINST LEGISLATIVE PUNISHMENT OF INDIVIDUALS

A bill of attainder is a legislative act which inflicts punishment without a judicial trial. It has in times past been used arbitrarily to deprive persons and even whole classes of people of their civil, political and property rights without trial or rehearing.[16] Bills of attainder have had a bloody history in England. Nor were they foreign to the several colonial assemblies here in this country during our early period.[17] Article I, section 9, was adopted to make certain that the Congress would be prohibited from passing bills of attainder. Such a prohibition secures to each the enjoyment of all civil, political and property rights without fear of punitive congressional action and prevents legislative infliction of punishment without affording the accused the safeguards of a judicial trial.

S. 40, if enacted, would be a legislative determination aimed directly at Governor Tugwell and Governor Tugwell alone. It would be a legislative act inflicting punishment without trial. The Congress would thereby exercise the function of the office of judge, and in the language of textbooks, assume "judicial magistracy."[18] It would pronounce upon the guilt of the Governor without any of the forms or safeguards of trial. This it would do without any of the judicial protections requiring proper proof and evidence—in fact without any opportunity for the Governor even to defend his position or to express his views. The prohibition against bills of attainder, together with the constitutional requirements of elementary fair play found in the due-process clause of the fifth amendment, condemns legislation such as S. 40.

It is true that S. 40 does not seek to imprison the Governor of Puerto Rico or to seize his property, but it is not to be supposed that the great guarantees of the Constitution against unfair legislative action are meaningless so long as the bill is directed only at a man's honor and his continuance in office. "The Constitution deals with substance, not shadows."[19] If a man may not constitutionally be subjected to a small fine without knowing the charge against him and without an opportunity to be heard, much less can he constitutionally be ousted from official position by legislative action based upon unknown grounds, and consummated without notice to the accused or opportunity to be heard in his own defense.

The United States Senate, at its last session, has reached the same conclusion. The Independent Offices Appropriation Act for 1943, as it reached the Senate floor contained the proviso—

"Provided, That no part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be used to pay the compensation of Goodwin Watson."

Six Senators took the floor to demand the elimination of the proviso. They objected that the clause was unconstitutional because it amounted to a bill of attainder,[20] because it was a legislative interference with the executive function,[21] and because it deprived Mr. Watson of his office without a trial or hearing;[22] it was also opposed as, for these reasons, reflecting thoroughly bad legislative policy.[23] Even the one Senator who undertook to explain the reasons for the provision that said conditioning an appropriation bill upon the removal of an employee "is not a desirable procedure."[24] The provision was eliminated on a voice vote[25] and was never restored.

The position of the Senate would apply with redoubled force here. Watson at least knew the objections which had been raised against him; the Governor of Puerto Rico is not informed, either by S. 40 or by the accompanying report, as to the cause for the enactment.

Watson appeared before a congressional committee to defend himself; the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs has acted without hearing the Governor or any of the interested agencies here or in Puerto Rico. The penalty proposed last pring operated only against Watson; here the committee undertakes to penalize the 2,000,000 residents of Puerto Rico because it does not like their duly appointed Governor.

No principle of our law is more cherished than that which insures that no man shall be condemned without a fair trial. No principle of our form of government is more basic than that which insures that neither the legislature nor the Executive shall control the functions of the other. S. 40 in its present form viciates both principles, and is unconstitutional.

ESTABLISHMENT AND MAINTENANCE OF MAXIMUM PRICES ON PORK AND BEEF PRODUCTS AND BREAD AND OTHER BAKERY PRODUCTS

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire at this time to make reference to a telegram I received this morning from the Meyer Kornblum Packing Co., of Kansas City, Kans. The telegram reads as follows:

KANSAS CITY, KANS., February 24, 1943.
Senator CLYDE M. REED,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: First, may I thank you for the interest you are taking in the problems of the packer and I assure you that your efforts are appreciated by all. From the text of Senate Resolution 94, which you recently presented to the Seventy-eighth Congress, I am sure you are thoroughly familiar with the situation. On Saturday, February 20, 1943, we received what is in effect to us a mandatory order to furnish the quartermaster 250,000 pounds of carcass beef at the existing ceiling price. Under the present Office of Price Administration regulations this company will take a loss of approximately $7,000 in filling this order. Although we feel it is our patriotic duty to cooperate with the Quartermaster Department in order that our armed forces should not suffer through the Office of Price Administration's mismanagement on the home front, we are not financially able to carry on for any length of time under these conditions. We are carrying on with our domestic business at about 25 percent of capacity and at a big loss trying to hold our organization together so that if and when this unjust muddle is cleared up we will be in position to utilize our vitally essential facilities in the war effort. This situation is prevalent among the small packers who like ourselves have limited capital and under these conditions in due time will be forced to cease operations. It is a fallacy to believe that our beef and pork supply can be processed and distributed to our armed forces without the aid of the small packers. It is my opinion that under the present set-up the Office of Price Administration with its discriminatory regulations is encouraging black-market operations and forcing small packers out of business. Our record of the past 8 months wherein we processed over 40,000 head of cattle for the armed forces is proof of our patriotism and willingness to cooperate with the Government if given half a chance. An expression of your views will be appreciated.

MEYER KORNBLUM PACKING CO.,
SAMUEL KORNBLUM,
Vice President.

Mr. President, I wish to add that I submitted Senate Resolution 94 in order to bring the matter in question to the attention of the public and the Senate. The resolution is now on the calendar. I wish to say to the Senate that the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, through a subcommittee, is preparing to hear the packers and bakers next week. That was all that I expected to accomplish by offering the resolution. Inasmuch as that end is being brought about, I am willing that the resolution remain on the calendar for consideration, if that be necessary, at some future time.

BLACK MARKETS—ADDRESS BY HON. PRENTISS M. BROWN AND INTERVIEW WITH EDWARD R. STETTINIUS, JR.

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, one of greatest services a Senator may extend to his constituents as a representative of a State, or that a Senator may extend to the people of the United States as a United States Senator, is to warn them of impending danger.

Rationing of food is necessarily changing our diets, which we hope will be for the better. The physical system may possibly undergo a change in nutrition. To my mind one of the greatest menaces to come from the rationing system is the so-called black market. Price Administrator Prentiss M. Brown has denounced black market operations as nothing short of treason and their operators as able assistants to the Nazis and Fascists.

Administrator Brown is unquestionably 100 percent correct in his assumption. The worst menace from the black market is in meat. Aside from the sabotage practice, is the danger of disease. Surreptitious handling of meats, unsanitary containers, and exposure to bacteria, necessarily increase the percentage of contamination. No emphasis of care in the meat menace is too strong. With changed physical systems the human body will be more susceptible to epidemics.

The privations of rationing are nothing new to Pennsylvanians, but the rationing, as we know, is for protection of the American people. It is ordered so that each and everyone may get his or her share of the food available for distribution. There should not be, and I do not believe there is, any disturbance in the minds of the people over this readjustment of food distribution. We are reliably informed that the nations to which we are sending food are at the same time contributing mainly to our soldiers stationed within their borders.

The pioneers of America, especially at Valley Forge, knew privations, not only of food, but of clothing, and our conditions do not approximate the distress of those times, for we are well provided for, and hope to continue to be for the duration.

Mr. President, I ask that Price Administrator Brown's remarks and a portion of an interview with Mr. Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., by Mr. Ernest K. Lindley be incorporated in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF PRICE ADMINISTRATOR PRENTISS M. BROWN

The success or failure of the drive against black markets is entirely up to the American public. All of the laws in the land, enforced by a sufficiently large organization which we do not possess, would be useless if the public fails to cooperate in stamping out this national pestilence.

We already have black markets in many rationed commodities—tires, coffee, sugar, and now meats—and the illegal operations in meats are by far the most serious—serious for many reasons.

Black markets affect our national economy. Our dollar decreases in purchasing power as the avaricious demands of these racketeers send prices skyrocketing. Black markets hold the people's food for ransom. They are another road to inflation.

Black markets depress the morale of the merchants and the public and, as the prices of essental foodstuffs rise, the spirit and morale of the people sink. Black markets are a service rendered to the enemy. The firm of Hitler and Hirohito would find it hard to devise an instrumentality more detrimental to the morale of the American people than unrestricted black markets in all foods. No Nazi propaganda could be more demoralizing.

Black markets will have a disastrous effect on the health of our people. Poisoned meats are making their appearance on these black markets. Control of this phase is practically impossible, and large sections of our population may become infected. What finer service could be performed for our enemies?

The Nazis and Fascists may not be able to sabotage our war plants, or bomb our industrial centers, but their able assistants—the operators of the black markets—contribute most effectively by helping to wreck American health, morale, and economy.

Black markets can only survive if the public becomes a party to their support. The Government will do everything possible to curb and prosecute these racketeers, who are undermining our war effort, national economy, and health.

The Government needs the assistance of every American in defeating these highjackers of our democracy.

The black markets must and will be stamped out. They give aid and comfort to the enemy—they are nothing short of treason.

WASHINGTON REPORTS ON RATIONING—STETTINIUS BROADCAST, SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1943

Mr. LINDLEY. Last week Mr. Prentiss Brown, Office of Price Administration Administrator, told us the "why" of rationing. Today we have the great privilege of hearing from Mr. Edward R. Stettinius, Jr., lend-lease administrator, who heads the Washington agency dealing with lend-lease affairs. I'm going to ask him chiefly about food shipments abroad—where and why we send foods, how much we export under lend-lease, what his future plans are. Mr. Stettinius, may I start today's interview by asking you just why we do send food abroad to our allies?

Mr. STETTINIUS. Mr. Lindley, food in its way is just as important as guns in fighting the enemy. Our food helped to sustain the British in their dark days when they stood alone. Our food is now helping the valiant Russians in their present offensives.

Mr. LINDLEY. Tell us, what's the relation between lend-lease shipments of food abroad and our shortages at home?

Mr. STETTINIUS. Mr. Lindley, I'll let you answer that question for yourself—as far as the present situation goes. Last year we lend-leased a total of 6 percent of our foodstuffs abroad. I think it's interesting to take up, one by one, the foods which we have supplied our allies.

Mr. LINDLEY. Fine. What about beef? Most Americans think anything is good to eat as long as it's beef.

Mr. STETTINIUS. Americans aren't alone in that taste. We shipped from our shores last year only 1 pound in every 500 of our supply of beef.

Mr. LINDLEY. That's, roughly, two-tenths of 1 percent of our beef. It's only a drop of gravy from a steak.

Mr. STETTINIUS. It's very small in relation to our supply, but the quantity was considerable—about 18,000,000 pounds. Under incoming or reciprocal lend-lease we received more than 25,000,000 pounds of beef from Australia and New Zealand—for our troops there, of course. We did export more pork because we had it—almost 10 percent of our pork production was lend-leased. Other meats shipped accounted for less than 1 percent of our output.

Mr. LINDLEY. What were our largest exports?

Mr. STETTINIUS. We sent 13 percent of our fats and oils to our allies. In Russia practically all of the food we provide goes to the fighting man.

Mr. LINDLEY. Do we send many eggs abroad?

Mr. STETTINIUS. Our eggs are sent in dried form to save shipping and they account for 10 percent of what our hens laid in 1942.

Mr. LINDLEY. What about dairy products?

Mr. STETTINIUS. We sent less than 1 percent of our butter to our allies, and all of that to Russian soldiers. A big slice of our cheese went abroad as a substitute for meat—about 23 percent of American production. In spite of the large amount of cheese, our total exports of milk products, including butter, cheese, dried, condensed, and evaporated milk, represented only 3½ percent of our total fluid-milk production.

Mr. LINDLEY. Do we get fish across the troubled waters?

Mr. STETTINIUS. Seven percent of our fishing catch has been canned and shipped out. Of course, some of the best European fishing grounds off the Scandinavian countries are under Nazi control. There's so little fresh fish in England now that it isn't even rationed.

Mr. LINDLEY. Since the American people are about to start on their adventures in the rationing of some of the canned and processed foods, tell us whether or not lend-lease has made this new rationing necessary.

Mr. STETTINIUS. Let me go back to the figures again, Mr. Lindley. We sent lend-lease countries last year less than 1 percent of our supply of canned vegetables. We managed to get on ships 1⅞₀ percent of our canned fruits and juices.

Mr. LINDLEY. We can all conclude quickly that lend-lease shipments had little to do with last year's shortages. Now, where does our food go? Why do we have shortages?

Mr. STETTINIUS. Civilians at home have a larger purchasing power and are eating more food than ever before. There's more money in the pockets of all the millions of war workers and farmers. They, too, need plenty of nourishing food to turn out guns and tanks and planes and food for our fighters. We are feeding our own armed forces well. A soldier or a sailor eats more than the average civilian. He should. He usually works harder and needs more food. Then we're collecting supplies of food for future offensives, for the push to final victory. Of course, lend-lease is shipping large quantities abroad, although they are small considering our total supply. And in 1943 it will be necessary to provide the other United Nations with much more food, probably double that furnished in 1942.

Mr. LINDLEY. Lend-lease isn't, as you indicated, a one-way street. We get some food from our allies, don't we?

Mr. STETTINIUS. Yes, indeed. Under lend-lease we pool all our resources—men, implements of war, food—so that we can all use them best when and where we need them. Let me give you an example. In England under reciprocal lend-lease, our fighting men receive, without payment, quarters, transportation, hospitalization, and some food. All their bread is made from British flour. Besides that, the British furnish our overseas soldiers with considerable quantities of potatoes, fruits, and vege bles, jam, and sugar.

Mr. LINDLEY. The Australians give our troops even more food, don't they?

Mr. STETTINIUS. Yes. Of course, they are a great food-producing country. For months, Australian civilians have gone without potatoes so that our men could eat them. We've taken practically all of their pork and canned meats, vegetables, and citrus fruits. In New Zealand, too, the civilians are tightening their belts to feed our men well. Australia and New Zealand have lend-leased for our troops more beef, lamb, mutton, and veal than we've lend-leased to the whole world.

Mr. LINDLEY. Now, about Russia.

Mr. STETTINIUS. Mr. Lindley, we are sharply increasing our food shipments to Russia. This year we expect to send them over half of the food supplies we lend-lease. You see, they've lost important parts of their food-producing lands—the Ukraine, the bread basket of Europe. One of my Washington colleagues was criticized lately for saying something like this: The more Nazis put out of action by the Russians, the fewer left for our boys to finish off. I'll stand by him; and in the work of lend-lease we shall send Russia as much food as we can to keep her soldiers strong and to help them drive the Germans from their land.

Mr. LINDLEY. I want to thank you for coming today and for explaining so well the part that lend-lease plays in winning the war. I know it will help to make victory quicker and peace more lasting.

THE FOOD-PRODUCTION PROGRAM

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, one of the most serious and portentous problems with which our country is now faced is that of food production. The unprecedented needs of our allies and ourselves, together with the unprecedented demands from all countries upon America's food production, require that the farmers in the United States produce the necessary foods in quantities never before anticipated.

Yet, despite these heavy demands, despite these glaring needs, and despite the imminent danger of a failure in the food-production program, no constructive step has been taken to insure the farmer the manpower, the prices, or the machinery necessary to attain his goals. The fact is that even though America is now faced with the tremendous need for increased food production, the administrative leaders of the agriculture program are still laboring under the delusion of scarcity.

Mr. Herbert Hoover and many other competent authorities have recently proclaimed to the public that this great and productive Nation stands in imminent danger of going hungry. This is an incontrovertible and shameful fact. During recent weeks, a number of revealing communications have come to my office from farmers, food dealers, and others who have made a study of this tremendous problem.

I have at hand one of the most informative letters which has yet come to my attention, with respect to the need for immediate remedial action regarding the food-production program. The letter, written by Mr. Tom Linder, Commissioner of Agriculture in the State of Georgia, under date of February 17, 1943, makes it plain that if the food-production program remains plagued with the present restrictions and present vague, obscure, and dictatorial administrative policies, America will fail in her obligations to herself and the world in this most vital of all programs, the production of food.

Mr. President, since I feel that Mr. Linder's letter evaluates in as few words as possible the grave shortcomings of our present agricultural program, and because I feel that it clearly outlines the steps necessary to alleviate these conditions and insure the success of the American food-production program, both during and after this war, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD, and that it be referred to the Committee on Agriculture, where it may be given further consideration and study.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
STATE CAPITOL,
Atlanta, February 17, 1943.

Hon. STEPHEN PACE,
The House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN PACE: In re House Resolution No. 1408, to include cost of all farm labor in parity formula for agricultural commodities.

Labor that goes into the production of farm commodities is as essentially a part of the cost of that product as labor that goes into the production of industrial products.

Under the Agricultural Adjustment Act the Secretary of Agriculture is fully authorized to include labor in determining parity.

Leaving labor cost out of parity determination is simply one of the steps of the Secretary of Agriculture to determine a fake parity instead of true parity under the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

A year ago I stated to the Subcommittees on Agriculture of the House and Senate that in my opinion no law passed by Congress would effectuate relief for farmers so long as the present Secretary of Agriculture remained in office. I am still of that opinion. An official who has no regard or respect for the acts of Congress cannot be relied upon to carry out any law passed by Congress in the spirit of its enactment.

I am sending a copy of this letter to a number of Senators and Congressmen in the hope that they will support your resolution, House Resolution 1408.

FOOD CANNOT WIN THE WAR, IF WE DO NOT HAVE THE FOOD

Corn quotas have been reduced and reduced and reduced until the Corn Belt is hardly self-sustaining, to say nothing of supplying sections that have depended upon buying feed.

On checking with the Department of Commerce I find that we have been importing a considerable quantity of cottonseed meal and cake from Argentina, Brazil, and Mexico. Today, without ships for importing feedstuffs from South America, we have a very acute shortage of cottonseed meal right here in the Cotton Belt.

Unless restrictions are taken off the farmers and the farmers are permitted to operate their individual farms to the best possible advantage, we cannot possibly feed our own civilian population in this country for a very great length of time, to say nothing of our armed forces and our allies overseas.

I note some newspapers are putting on a brave front in an effort to support administration policies and are saying that Georgia farmers will produce or exceed their quotas in the 1943 Victory food program. These people are simply "whistling in the graveyard," and expressing wishful thinking. The outlook for production in Georgia at this time is for a reduction of 40 percent below 1942.

DISSATISFACTION, UNCERTAINTIES, AND SHORTAGE OF SUPPLY AND LABOR, ALL PLAYING A PART

The best information obtainable at this time is that we have 100,000 fewer adults on Georgia farms today than we had at planting time in 1942. There is an acute shortage of farm labor, farm implements and equipment, and a shortage of fertilizer.

In addition to the above many of our best farmers are so disgusted with Government control, unceasing trips to the county seat for instructions, unfair treatment in prices, and the idea that the present administration is hostile to all agriculture, that they are not in a frame of mind to risk bankruptcy to produce cheap crops for an administration that mistreats them at every turn.

These are hard facts but they are facts, and must be faced if the administration hopes to get anything like maximum production under present conditions.

In many cases in Georgia men who have labor do not have sufficient quotas, while men who do not have labor have more quotas than they can plant. This condition neutralizes a considerable part of the labor that is now on the farms.

INCLUDING LABOR COST WILL HELP

The inclusion of labor cost in determining parity will certainly be of immense help provided the Secretary of Agriculture will honestly include this labor cost in determining parity. As stated above, it will make no difference for Congress to enact such a bill if the Secretary of Agriculture does not carry out the purpose of the bill.

FARM MORALE IS CRACKING

Let no one be deceived. Farm morale is rapidly breaking up in this section. Unless the administration gives assurance of higher prices for farm products and takes the strings off the farmer, no bill that Congress can pass will be worth the paper it is written on.

The crops in this country are produced by bona fide farmers who have struggled to pay their own way in the past. No farmers who are existing on the farm only through Government subsidies are hardly self-sustaining, let alone able to feed the balance of the country. Subsidies of $100,000,000, $200,000,000, or $500,000,000 paid out only to selected farmers will make the situation worse instead of better.

Only by a guaranty of prices to all farmers that will enable them to produce can the country expect crops that even with rationing will suffice to provide the necessary food in the coming months.

BY ALL MEANS PASS H. R. 1408

H. R. 1403 should be passed at once, but do not stop with the passage of H. R. 1408.

Agriculture is the No. 1 war industry at this time. It is the rock on which the entire building sits. If it is allowed to crack, the balance of our war efforts will fall of their own weight.

With kindest personal regards, I am,
Sincerely yours,

TOM LINDER,

NEED FOR A WORKING LIAISON BETWEEN THE SENATE AND THE EXECUTIVE

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I see that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. CONNALLY] is present in the Chamber. I ask him if he will not kindly give consideration to Senate Resolution 22, which I offered almost a year ago, and which was resubmitted on January 7, 1943, and give me an opportunity to be heard before the committee. I have received favorable expressions on the subject of the resolution from leading newspapers and magazines, which apparently have found much merit in the resolution. I have asked some of my Republican friends to cooperate, but for some reason or other there seems to have been a brake on the subject. The people are entitled to be heard on it.

The resolution contemplates a working liaison between the Senate and the President. It reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Chief Executive be invited to join with the Senate in the creation of a Foreign Relations Advisory Council to be constituted of the following: The Secretary of State, the Under Secretary of State, other technicians whom the Secretary of State might designate, the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, and the chairman and the ranking minority member of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, and such other Senators as the President might from time to time designate.

Anyone with eyes to see and ears to hear ought to know that we are facing a tremendous challenge. Various plans have been suggested to the country as to what direction the peace should take. After the last war the President, who as the president of a great university, had preached the need of the President taking the advice of the Senate in the negotiation of a treaty, disregarded his own preachment and presented to the Senate a treaty which was practically a fait accompli, as he considered it. We know the result. There ensued one of the greatest catastrophes of the world. What might have been, no one can say; but we know that after the war with Spain President McKinley saw the need of placing a couple of Senators among the plenipotentiaries in working out a treaty.

Mr. President, I should like to know whose war this is. Is it the Executive's war or the people's war? I should like to know whose peace it will be—the Executive's peace or the people's peace.

Under the Constitution Senators are charged with advising and consenting in connection with a treaty. Most of the principal newspapers in the country—even including the reticent Washington Post—have commented favorably on this proposal. For 8 months last year the resolution to which I have made reference lay in the dusty, musty pigeonholes of the Committee on Foreign Relations without consideration, and it is there now, to be resurrected, I hope, if my remarks have any effect.

It is particularly interesting to note that recently some of the distinguished Members of the Senate have said to me that they are interested in the proposal, which the editorial leaders of the Nation believe contains merit. I believe that the resolution contains merit. I have no particular pride of parenthood in it. I believe that basically it goes to the question to which the world is seeking an answer. It involves a matter of coo,eration.

If the Senate and President will cooperate we shall probably have an answer to future wars, or at least an answer to some of the troubles associated with economic and political problems which are facing the Nation today.

The world is looking for the answers to many questions. The answers will never be found until the nations learn to cooperate. So, too, the answers will not be found to certain questions, until the Senate and the Executive learn to cooperate—especially in those spheres where the Constitution requires that they "play ball together."

The purpose of the proposed liaison committee is to create machinery for cooperative effort. I should think the Chief Executive would welcome the adoption of this resolution.

So I ask the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations to take up the resolution and allow me an opportunity to be heard before the committee.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. WILEY. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I desire to say to the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin that his resolution will receive the attention of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I cannot make any commitment as to what the committee will do, because I do not carry its authority around with me. The committee is fairly representative of the membership of the Senate, and will be glad to consider the resolution.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, the resolution was pending in the committee for 8 months last year, and it has been before the committee for 2 months during the present session. I am taking advantage of the opportunity now to ask that I be given an opportunity to present the matter before the committee so that the resolution may receive consideration by the committee.

Mr. CONNALLY. We shall be very glad to hear the Senator at any time that is mutually convenient. However, it does not necessarily follow that merely because the resolution is in the committee it should be reported and adopted. A great many bills are before the Committee on Foreign Relations which have not been reported. We do not report bills until we study them, analyze them, digest them, put them "through the wringer," and determine what course to pursue. We do not merely make speeches in the Senate and pass bills on that basis.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I challenge the remarks of the able Senator from Texas.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I call for the regular order, because the morning business has not as yet been completed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order has been demanded.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be privileged to comment on the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Texas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BARKLEY. I shall not object if the Senator does not consume more than 5 minutes.

Mr. WILEY. I assure the able leader that I shall not take more than 2 minutes.

Mr. President, my point, first, is that there has been no meditation on the resolution. Second, no study or analysis of it has been made by the committee. The resolution has been frozen in the committee; and I now believe it is time that consideration be given to it by the committee. As I have said, I have no pride of parenthood in the resolution. I am greatly concerned with the problem of what is to happen a year from now, or 2 or 3 years from now, when peace appears upon the horizon. I do not wish to see the country suffer another such mix-up as we had following the last war. I ask for consideration of the resolution, and I ask my Republican brethren to see that I get an opportunity to be heard, and that the resolution is taken out of the cobwebs and pigeonholes of the committee.

TENTH ANNUAL BROTHERHOOD WEEK

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, this is the tenth annual celebration of Brotherhood Week. In the Nazi war of nerves, the strategem of divide and conquer has played an important part. Time and time again Axis agents have sown the seeds of hate and disunity within the countries they are attacking. But here in the United States the Axis campaign to divide Americans along racial and religious lines has failed.

The tenth annual Brotherhood Week which we are now observing is proof of this—a proof of the revulsion of the American people against hate fomented by the Nazis, a proof of our united aim for the achievement of brotherhood and good will among the peoples of the world.

The slogan of this year's observance, "Victory for brotherhood," reaffirms our conviction that upon the outcome of this war depend freedom, liberty, and equality among men regardless of race, color, or creed.

Brotherhood Week, which began last Friday, is sponsored by the National Conference of Christians and Jews. It is endorsed by the President and by Governors, mayors, educators, labor leaders, editors, and civic and religious leaders throughout the country. The spirit of Brotherhood Week is illustrated by a story which most of us may remember reading in the newspapers, but which I should like to repeat here.

It is about three American boys in the Navy—a Protestant, a Catholic, and a Jew—united by their common faith in American democracy and in freedom, who met death together and were buried side by side. Their plane crashed in the harbor of San Juan, P. R., on the last day of the old year. The three young airmen—Lt. Edward Mallory Vogel, of Erwin, Tenn.; Edwin J. Sipowsky, of Waukegan, Ill.; and Issie Goldberg, of New York City—were buried together in the cemetery at Santurce. A Protestant chaplain read the service for Vogel, a Catholic priest for Sipowsky, a Jewish rabbi for Goldberg. Every member of the squadron was present. The Stars and Stripes, for which they died, was over each of them. Did their different religious faiths divide them? No, because their common faith in a common cause united them, as it unites the millions of Americans who are fighting for freedom.

Here is our answer to Hitler's hate campaign. Here is the reason why the celebration of Brotherhood Week this year takes on a deepened significance.

Now let me read the proclamation of President Roosevelt:

> The perpetuation of democracy depends upon the practice of the brotherhood of man.

The American conviction in war and in peace has been that man finds his freedom only when he shares it with others. People of every race, every creed, are able to live together as Americans on this basis. We are fighting for the right of men to live together as members of one family rather than as masters and slaves.

Let me repeat that:

We are fighting for the right of men to live together as members of one family rather than as masters and slaves.

There is another answer to Hitler.

The President's proclamation continues:

We are fighting that the spirit of brotherhood which we prize in this country may be practiced here and by freemen everywhere. It is our promise to extend such brotherhood earth wide which gives hope to all the world. The war makes the appeal of Brotherhood Week stronger than ever.

The President concluded:

I trust that the call of the National Conference of Christians and Jews to affirm anew the religious principles of understanding, justice, friendliness, and cooperation on which the realization of brotherhood lasts will be heeded across the land by those of every occupation and religious allegiance. It is the application of these principles that makes our country united and strong.

Mr. President and my colleagues, the response to the President's appeal has been widespread and spontaneous. Leaders of all religious groups—Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish—have formally endorsed the observance of Brotherhood Week. They include Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam, of the Methodist Church; Dr. Ferdinand Q. Blanchard, moderator of the Congregational Christian Churches; Dr. Joseph C. Robbins, president of the Northern Baptist Convention; William Cardinal O'Connell, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Boston; the Most Reverend Thomas E. Molloy, Bishop of Brooklyn; Archbishop John J. Cantwell, of Los Angeles; Archbishop Robert E. Lucey, of San Antonio, Tex.; and Rabbi Israel Goldstein, president of the Synagogue Council of America.

Among the labor leaders who have formally announced their support of Brotherhood Week are William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, and David J. McDonald, secretary-treasurer of the United Steel Workers of America.

Governors of a number of States have issued proclamations urging the cooperation of all citizens in Brotherhood Week.

I think it is only fitting, Mr. President, that we in the Senate—we who represent the American people, with their divergent races and creeds—pledge ourselves to solemn observance of American unity through Brotherhood Week. Let us pause to be grateful for our heritage of American freedom and tolerance. Let us resolve that the victory of freemen over the evil forces of fascism will establish the spirit of brotherhood throughout the world.

TRANSPORTATION OF PETROLEUM BY PIPE LINE

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 103) submitted by Mr. CLARK of Missouri (for himself, Mr. REED, Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, Mr. LUCAS, Mr. MOORE, Mr. KILGORE, Mr. BURTON, Mr. WHERRY, and Mr. CAPPER) on February 15, 1943, was read, as follows:

Whereas the production of ships, the making of high-octane gasoline, and the construction of synthetic-rubber plants have been and are being delayed because of the shortage of necessary materials; and

Whereas it is now proposed to construct a steel pipe line from points in Texas northeast to a point in Indiana for the transportation principally of petroleum products; and

Whereas the construction of such pipe line will consume materials and labor in competition with the above-mentioned projects and will cost a vast sum of money; and

Whereas the diversion and use of vast quantities of critical materials and labor would be justified only if alternative means of transportation for petroleum products, such as barges and railroad tank cars, are not and cannot be made available, and then only if the projected pipe line is so located and of such character as to provide the maximum increase in the required transportation capacity for petroleum and petroleum products; and

Whereas it has been contended that recently announced plans of the War Production Board and the Petroleum Administrator for War for projected additional pipe-line construction do not meet these requirements, and that consideration should be given to constructing other pipe lines in other locations and to alternative means of transporting petroleum products: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a full and complete study and investigation be made for the purpose of determining (1) the necessity and desirability of constructing any additional pipe line; (2) the extent to which any projected pipe line would unduly compete for scarce materials and labor with other programs necessary to the war effort; (3) the type, location, and use of any projected pipe line and the functions to be performed by it; (4) the availability of any alternative means of transportation for petroleum products, such as barges or railroad tank cars; and (5) the possibility of increasing the efficiency of present facilities for the transportation of petroleum by rerouting or otherwise.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution go over without prejudice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will go over.

SOLDIERS' MAIL

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, the Army Postal Service, a branch of the Adjutant General's Department, is today providing postal service to all areas throughout the world where United States forces are stationed. Headed by Brig. Gen. Clayton S. Adams and staffed by experienced postal personnel, the Army Postal Service is affording complete postal facilities at all overseas Army post offices. Utilizing every available means of transportation, the Army Postal Service is dispatching mail at the rate of 15,000,000 pieces a week, the most tremendous mail-handling job ever undertaken by any postal system in the world.

While an integral part of the Army organization, the Army Postal Service is operated in close collaboration with the civil Postal Establishment.

From Iceland to India and from the African desert to the jungles of New Guinea and Guadalcanal, the United States Army mails are being received and distributed with regularity and dispatch, and in volume. Mails to our overseas forces at the present time are three times greater than during the peak period of World War No. 1.

The remarkable accomplishment of the Army Postal Service under the most trying circumstances of war is due in large measure to the keen appreciation had by those directing Army operations so magnificently of the value of good mail service as a vital factor of morale.

The insistence of the Secretary of War, General Marshall, General Somervell, General Ulio, and General Adams that we provide our troops with the best possible mail service under any and all circumstances is being reflected daily at mail calls among American troops at home and abroad

I wish to state further in this connection, Mr. President, that from time to time, I have heard innumerable compliments of the magnificent manner in which this mail service is being provided and handled for the benefit of our men at home and abroad. Only a few days ago I had the privilege and honor of talking to General Ulio, The Adjutant General of the United States Army, under whose direction this work is handled, and I took advantage of the opportunity to congratulate him, for I think General Ulio is doing a magnificent work, and that he deserves the praise and thanks of our several million men in the armed forces.

I, therefore, ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, in this connection, to have printed in the body of the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, a very interesting and timely article from the March 1943 issue of the Reader's Digest entitled "Soldiers' Mail," by Stanley High, which article was condensed from the Rotarian.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOLDIERS' MAIL

(Condensed from The Rotarian)

(By Stanley High)

Thirty thousand letters to American soldiers overseas were "lost" when a plane crashed off Newfoundland last October. Two weeks later, divers recovered the 40 mail bags from 40 feet of water. At the Army Post Office in New York City Army mail clerks took over. Each of the 30,000 envelopes was separately dried. Within a month all but 20 pounds of the 1,000 pounds of letters had been readdressed, reenveloped when necessary, and dispatched again overseas.

When the United States expeditionary force set out for Africa, members of the Army Postal Service were on the transports. En route they sorted mail received just prior to sailing. Ashore, they set up mobile post offices, advanced with the troops, and were passing out mail to soldiers who had been less than 24 hours in Africa.

Last December, Christmas mail was still being posted here, too late for regular delivery to troops overseas. General Marshall and Secretary Stimson are great believers in the value of mail, so the Army Air Transport Command turned over more than a dozen big planes and 31,000,000 belated Christmas letters, some of them posted only 10 days before December 25, reached the troops in time.

Thus, on every continent and on islands from Iceland to Guadalcanal, the postal services of the Army and Navy are delivering the mail to our fighting men, against unbelievable odds of geography, war, and acts of God. For mail from home, as boost and bolster for morale, is a military necessity.

These overseas post offices are set up in trucks, tents, boats, hotels, schools, and even churches. The Army Post Office on Guadalcanal is in a wooden building which the Japs put up. Trucks from each combat unit pick up mail there, and platoon sergeants have carried letters directly to men in the fox holes. In Greenland and Alaska some mail is dropped from planes. Many bags of mail a week go by air to the Aleutians. In Australia, chartered commercial planes give daily service over a 3,000-mile route.

When mail from home arrives overseas, the postal clerks don't stop sorting until all of it is ready for distribution. When, for example, 7,000 bags of mail arrived at New Caledonia on December 15, the post office went on a 24-hour shift until the last letter had been sorted.

An officer of the Army Postal Service reports that "in the middle of battle, with stuff dropping all around them, men will put the mail call ahead of the mess call." "If I had to choose," a navy skipper told me, "between taking aboard fresh food or mail, I'd take mail every time. The boys seem to manage when food is scarce, but being short-rationed on mail really gets them down."

Army Postal Service estimates that the average soldier writes four letters a week and receives seven. Not all of this mail comes from families or friends. To buck up Private Tommy Smith, a whole county may have been organized to write him letters. A radio program offers prizes to children who get persons to write to soldiers. Of 150 letters recently received by a unit in Iceland, 83 such mass-production messages went to one soldier, and Fort Devens, Mass., received 1,400 letters addressed to a soldier no one at Devens or in the War Department had ever heard of. Such organized letter writing is a headache—the soldiers don't care for letters from strangers, and the War Department urges that people write only to soldiers they know.

A cable can be sent to or by a soldier in the Atlantic or Pacific areas for 60 cents, if one of 136 form messages is used. These cover almost every contingency: "Love and Kisses," "Are You All Right? Worried About You," "Son Born," and so on. Last November the Army Post Office in New York sent through 40,000 such cables.

About 10 percent of Army-Navy mail is improperly addressed. Last October the New York Port of Embarkation Post Office handled 379,800 such letters and 7,280 misaddressed parcels. The full time of 100 men is required to run down and correct these mistakes. Ninety-five percent of them finally reach their intended destination—but not as promptly as if they were properly addressed. Inclusion of the Army Post Office (A. P. O.) number is especially important, for if it is omitted, the letter or parcel must be held up until the alphabetical personnel files are thumbed through and the number is found and added.

Every large port post office has a staff of men to rewrap inadequately packaged tokens of love from home—a pathetic welter of battered cakes, melted chocolates, socks, framed photographs, and scores of other things.

Under a recent regulation, no more packages may be sent to troops overseas unless you present to your post office a soldier's request for the article and his commanding officer's approval. Too many people were sending things that were either provided by the Army or could be bought more cheaply at a post exchange. For example, 20 percent of the packages to soldiers contained cigarettes, which troops overseas can buy for 5 or 6 cents a pack.

Home-town newspapers take much badly needed cargo space; and reports, particularly from combat areas, indicate that they are only sketchily read. Hence, newspapers and magazines may be sent to soldiers and sailors only by the publishers.

The safest, speediest letter service to men overseas is V-mail. It was launched last June and about 1,000,000 V-letters are delivered every week. Where V-mail facilities exist, it is now the only mail service by air to and from men overseas.

Instead of forwarding the letter itself, the A. P. O. has it photographed on 16-millimeter microfilm, one 90-foot roll of which will contain miniature reproductions of 1,700 V-letters and weighs only 5½ ounces. To transport 1,700 ordinary one-page letters would require 34 times as much cargo space.

After crossing the ocean and arriving at a V-mail station, a photographic enlargement of each letter is made and sealed in an envelope for delivery to the person addressed. If microfilms are lost in transit, the port post office sends duplicates. To use V-mail simply ask for a form at your local post office or stationer, write your message on it, address carefully, stamp it, and mail it as you would any other letter.

Last October the U. S. O. in San Francisco received a packet of several hundred letters without envelopes, written to home folks by marines on Guadalcanal. Stationery had run out, so the boys had used mud-spattered Chinese rice paper or scraps of wrapping paper. A marine chaplain on Guadalcanal had sent the bundle to the U. S. O. with the request that the letters be addressed and mailed—which they promptly were.

"The mail," said a navy postal officer, "is a valuable munition of war, and we treat it as such."

So, when you write a cheerful letter to your soldier, you're really "passing the ammunition."

PREVENTION OF DEDUCTIONS IN DETERMINING PARITY OR COMPARABLE PRICES OF AGRICULTURAL COMMODITIES

The VICE PRESIDENT. The routine morning business is concluded.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 660.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read by title for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. A bill (S. 660) to prevent certain deductions in determining parity or comparable prices of agricultural commodities, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have no objection, and I shall not oppose taking up the bill. I may desire to make some general observations regarding the subject when the bill is under consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand it is not debatable at this hour.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 660) to prevent certain deductions in determining parity or comparable prices of agricultural commodities, and for other purposes, which is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in determining the parity price or comparable price for any agricultural commodity, and in establishing, maintaining, or adjusting any maximum price or prices for any agricultural commodity, or for any commodity processed or manufactured in whole or in substantial part from any agricultural commodity, no deduction shall be made by any agency of the Government for any subsidy payment, parity payment, conservation payment, incentive payment, or other payment made with respect to any agricultural commodity. The agencies of the Government having jurisdiction with respect to such prices and payments shall make such adjustment in any such prices heretofore determined or established as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, it will be recalled that promptly after the approval of the Stabilization Act early last October an Executive order was issued providing for the stabilization of the national economy, and there was included in that order section 2 which came as a distinct surprise to most, if not all, the Members of the Senate. Section 2 reads as follows:

2. In establishing, maintaining, or adjusting maximum prices for agricultural commodities or for commodities processed or manufactured in whole or in substantial part from any agricultural commodity, appropriate deductions shall be made from parity price or comparable price for payments made under the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act, as amended, parity payments made under the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, and governmental subsidies.

I think it will be generally agreed, Mr. President, by the members of the Banking and Currency Committee which considered the stabilization or price-control measure, by the Members of the Senate who heard the discussion of the bill, and by the members of the conference committee, all of them, that this subject was not mentioned from the beginning to the end of the deliberations on the bill, and, it never having been mentioned, no one had any idea that the bill would be construed in such a way as to permit a reduction in maximum prices or in parity prices.

Section 3 of the act of October 2, 1942, provides:

SEC. 3. No maximum price shall be established or maintained for any agricultural commodity under authority of this act or otherwise below a price which will reflect to producers of agricultural commodities the higher of the following prices, as determined and published by the Secretary of Agriculture—

(1) The parity price for such commodity (adjusted by the Secretary of Agriculture for grade, location, and seasonal differentials) or, in case a comparable price has been determined for such commodity under and in accordance with the provisions of section 3 (b) of the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, such comparable price (adjusted in the same manner), or

(2) The highest price received by such producers for such commodity between January 1, 1942, and September 15, 1942—

And so forth.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEWART in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to ask the Senator if I am correct in my understanding that the purpose of this bill is to reenact what was enacted in the original bill but which was misconstrued by the Department, and to make it so plain that anybody can understand it, even the Department itself?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator is entirely correct. This bill simply makes clear what the Senate thought it was doing at the time of the passage of the act.

Mr. President, I shall not indulge in a very long discussion of this matter, because I think practically every Member of the Senate is familiar with this controversy. I have a letter from the master of the National Grange, which I send to the clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

THE NATIONAL GRANGE,
Washington, D. C.

Hon. JOHN H. BANKHEAD,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR BANKHEAD: We have always felt that the Price Control Act of October 2 set forth a very clear policy that maximum prices should be adjusted to meet rising costs, and that subsidies should not be used either in lieu of fair prices or any calculated ceilings with reference to parity.

We are therefore glad to see your bill S. 660, and trust it will receive the favorable consideration of the Congress.

Yours very truly,

A. S. GOSS,
Master, National Grange.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I now send forward a letter from Mr. Ezra T. Benson, executive secretary of the National Council of Farmer Cooperatives, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF
FARMER COOPERATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 11, 1943.

Senator JOHN H. BANKHEAD 2d,
United States Senate,

DEAR SENATOR BANKHEAD: On behalf of the many cooperative organizations affiliated with this council, with farmer memberships totaling in excess of 2,000,000, distributed in all of the 48 States, we endorse the principles of your bill S. 660, "to prevent certain deductions in determining parity or comparable prices of agricultural commodities, and for other purposes."

Practically all farmers are firmly and unalterably opposed to subsidies in lieu of a fair price in the market place that will result in maximum production. We believe that your bill is in line with the intent of Congress when it passed the Price Control Act of October 2, 1942. It seems to us unfortunate that legislation of the character of S. 660 is necessary when Congress, as we believe, so clearly intended that the parity price referred to was the price in the market place, exclusive of Government subsidies, incentive, conservation, or other Government payments.

The farmers of this country are disappointed and discouraged because they are prevented from producing, to the maximum, the vital foods necessary to the effective winning of the war, when Congress clearly intended that modifications in ceiling prices in the market should be made "to increase the production" of farm products for war purposes.

Sincerely yours,

EZRA T. BENSON,
Executive Secretary.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I now send forward a letter from Mr. Charles W. Holman, secretary of the National Cooperative Milk Producers' Federation, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

THE NATIONAL COOPERATIVE MILK
PRODUCERS' FEDERATION,
Washington, D. C., February 23, 1943.

Hon. JOHN H. BANKHEAD,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BANKHEAD: We would like to advise you that the National Cooperative Milk Producers Federation wishes to go on record as supporting your bill, S. 660. We believe that this bill will correct the present violation of the intent of Congress in that parity and conservation payments should not be included in computing ceiling prices for specific commodities.

The provision that subsidy and incentive payments shall not be included in computing parity and comparable prices should do much to discourage the program of subsidies and incentive payments to which we are unalterably opposed.

Sincerely yours,

CHAS. W. HOLMAN,
Secretary.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I now send to the desk a letter from Mr. Edward A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, and ask that it be read by the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
Washington, D. C., February 11, 1943.

Hon. JOHN H. BANKHEAD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR BANKHEAD: I want to congratulate you on your success in getting prompt approval of the Senate Committee on Agriculture of your bill, S. 660, which will prevent the inclusion of subsidy payments in fixing price ceilings on agricultural commodities. Farmers deeply appreciate this action. I hope the Senate will speedily approve this bill.

Farmers everywhere are united in opposition to the policy of paying subsidies in lieu of fair prices. Representatives of four great national farm organizations recently adopted unanimously a statement opposing the payment of subsidies in lieu of fair prices to farmers for agricultural commodities. Farmers do not want to be forced into the position of seeking subsidies when fair prices can be obtained in the market place. If there ever was a time when the consuming public is able to pay fair prices for farm commodities, they can do so now when our national income has reached the record-breaking total of approximately $120,000,000,000 annually, and certainly workers are receiving the highest wages in the history of the Nation. Despite increases in the cost of food, the average nonfarm worker is paying only 22 percent of his income for food, which is the lowest percentage in the past 30 years.

We do not believe that Congress intended the Office of Price Administration to include subsidies in fixing maximum prices on agricultural commodities. Neither the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942 nor the act of October 2, 1942, authorized such action. On the contrary, the provisions relating to ceilings on agricultural commodities, which are very specific and mandatory in character, refer consistently to prices rather than to mandatory rates or payments.

Notwithstanding, the Office of Price Administration, by administrative interpretation, has adopted the policy of including subsidy payments to farmers in fixing ceilings on agricultural commodities. This maximum price recently imposed upon corn is a flagrant illustration. This ceiling, in our opinion, is a violation of the intent, if not the letter, of the law, which prohibits the placing of ceilings on any agricultural commodity below the parity price. This price ceiling on corn is based on market price and not farm price, and is based upon the inclusion of payments to farmers, with the result that the maximum price fixed on corn is considerably below the parity price to farmers, although the law specifically prohibits fixing maximum prices on any agricultural commodity at such a level as will reflect a price to farmers below the parity price of such commodity.

I hope that Congress will speedily approve your bill in order to protect farmers against this abuse of administrative power.

Sincerely yours,

EDW. A. O'NEAL,
President.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am glad to yield.

Mr. WHITE. The senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] is necessarily absent because of illness. It is in my mind that he is the ranking minority member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and many on this side look upon him as our authority in agricultural matters. Is the Senator from Alabama in a position to indicate the attitude of the Senator from Oregon toward the proposed legislation?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am very glad the Senator propounded the inquiry. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], the minority leader, was present at the meeting of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry when the bill was considered and reported. The Senator from Oregon took an active part in bringing about a favorable report on the bill; in fact, there was no opposition in the committee on the part of those in attendance, by either Democrats or Republicans. The vote to report the bill was unanimous.

Mr. WHITE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. In view of the letter just read by the clerk, coming from Mr. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, I should like to ask the Senator whether the proposed legislation would affect the Executive order putting a ceiling on corn?

Mr. BANKHEAD. So far as the effect on an order in existence is concerned, I have given that subject some thought.

The bill nullifies the Executive order providing that all benefit payments must be deducted from parity prices and ceiling prices.

Mr. LUCAS. I can appreciate that, but I am wondering whether the proposed legislation will meet the question I raise with respect to the position in which the corn farmer finds himself at the present time as a result of an Executive order which says that corn cannot be sold for a price above 88 cents a bushel.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It would nullify that, because this order is prospective, and the deductions under the order are prospective. That would be my legal opinion about it.

Mr. LUCAS. Assuming the proposed legislation shall be enacted, would the President have the power, in the opinion of the Senator, to follow out by Executive order what the departments have been doing, which seems to be more or less contrary to what the Congress intended for them to do?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think he would not have the power, and that he would not assume to exercise such power. In view of the fact that there has been a controversy ever since this matter was acted on, if favorable action shall be taken specifically on the proposition, I think the President, as the Chief Executive of the United States, the chief law enforcement officer, will observe and respect the action of Congress. The President had an opinion on the subject, we have been told, and we know about the controversy, and what was put into the RECORD here, and so forth, on which the President acted; but there would be no justification of any sort for anyone disregarding the provisions of the law, if the bill should be enacted.

I will say further to the Senator that Congress, rather than the President, has the power, if it wishes to exercise it, to control the appropriations, through the agricultural appropriation bill, as it has done in the past through limitations.

Mr. LUCAS. There is no question about that. Now, let me propound a further question. Can the Senator tell me how many commodities would be affected as the result of the proposed legislation?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It affects all who get benefit payments, and the incentive payments suggested are benefit payments. If the law stands as it is now, a farmer will not benefit by accepting incentive payments, because they will be deducted from his parity or ceiling prices. It will go in one pocket and out of the other.

Mr. LUCAS. Am I to understand from the Senator that in the event a commodity is selling, for instance, at a figure above the parity price, the farmer will still get the parity payment for that product?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is up to the Appropriation Committees of the Congress. It is not required by the pending bill. The only effect of the bill on that matter would be to prohibit the deduction of those payments under the order, and leave to the Congress the matter of dealing with the commodity.

Mr. LUCAS. It is my understanding that once a basic commodity reaches the parity price, the individual who has benefited through parity payments is not entitled to parity payments thereafter.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is provided in the last appropriation bill. It is up to Congress to provide it again, and provide such limitations, if it sees fit.

Mr. LUCAS. Let me ask the Senator what his opinion is with respect to a commodity which reaches parity, as to whether or not the farmer is entitled to an additional parity payment above the parity the commodity has reached.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think it depends entirely upon the nature and character of the payment.

Mr. LUCAS. If the Senator will yield further, of course there are only two basic commodities at the present time to the producers of which the proposed legislation will give some aid and comfort, and I sincerely hope that the Senator is correct in his position when he says it will nullify the order whereby corn has been placed in a very unfavorable position. I hope that is true. But wheat and corn are the two basic commodities which are far under the parity price at the present time. As I understand, all other basic commodities have reached parity, or are above parity.

I agree with the suggestion in Mr. O'Neal's letter. If any basic commodity, or any byproduct thereof, has reached the parity point, I hope the Appropriations Committee will take that into consideration in the determination of the amount which should be appropriated for parity payments. If they will just take the ceiling off corn and leave the loan value where it is, corn will reach parity through the law of supply and demand.

Mr. President, I wish to say further that all through the debate and action on legislation dealing with the farmers since I have been in Congress, I have at times stood on the floor of the House and Senate and said that the farmer did not want a dole, that the farmer did not want subsidy payments, but that what he wanted was parity price for what he was producing.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Parity price in the market place.

Mr. LUCAS. Precisely; parity price in the market place. I hope that when the time comes the Appropriations Committee will consider the philosophy which has been expounded over a period of years in Congress with respect to parity payments.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BALL in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. There have never been any parity payments made to the farmers where the commodity was bringing parity in the market place.

Mr. LUCAS. That statement is what I wanted to hear. I thought that was the law.

Mr. RUSSELL. That cannot be done under the basic law. Even if Congress were to make an appropriation of a billion dollars for the purpose of making parity payments, not one dime of the money would be expended if the commodities were bringing parity in the market place. We made parity appropriations of approximately $212,000,000 for the fiscal year 1941, and less than half that money was spent, because of the fact that some of the commodities were already bringing parity.

Others were bringing a little less than parity. Therefore only those farmers received parity payments whose commodities could not be sold for a price equal to or greater than parity.

Mr. President, there is much confusion as between parity payments and soil conservation payments. The soil conservation payments have been deducted in determining the amount of the parity payments the farmer would receive. In other words, the average price that the commodity brought in the market place would be added to soil conservation payments on the commodity, and if the total were less than parity, then parity payments were made on such commodity. Let us assume that the parity on corn was a dollar a bushel, and it brought 85 cents in the market place. The amount of the soil conservation payment was added to the 85 cents to determine whether the corn farmer was to receive any parity payments. Insofar as parity payments themselves are concerned, they are never made where a commodity brings parity, and cannot be made under the terms of the basic agricultural adjustment act of 1938 if the market price is equal to or greater than parity.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama again yield to me?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. That was my understanding, and that is the reason I asked the question I did of the Senator from Alabama. I appreciate the explanation which has been made by the able Senator from Georgia, because it is tremendously important.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think every one understands this subject. It has been thoroughly considered and discussed since the Executive order was made. I do not care to debate the subject further. I know of no objection to the measure. I ask for a vote on it.

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, how much will the total amount in benefit payments to the farmers be under the pending measure? Has the Senator made an estimate of it?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No. It depends on what benefit payments are made to the farmers.

Mr. GUFFEY. I wondered if there were any figures on that point.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; there are not.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I simply wish to make one observation before the vote is taken on the bill, and that is with respect to the opinion which has been advanced by the able Senator from Alabama regarding legislation negating the authority which exists at the present time through an Executive order placing a ceiling on corn. That is a very important matter in my section of the country, and I think it is important wherever corn is produced for the commercial market.

For instance, only yesterday I received a telegram from a farmer living near Belvidere, Ill., who has 16,000 lambs he is feeding at the present time. He states unequivocally that he cannot feed these lambs much longer, because he cannot buy the corn he needs for feed. Why is it that he cannot buy the corn? The primary reason is that at the moment the farmers in my section are tremendously disturbed at the price of this commodity. Every farmer feels that sooner or later, through the Congress of the United States, or through another Executive order, the corn farmer is going to be permitted to obtain a parity price for corn. Consequently the farmer who has the corn in the crib or in the elevator or in the terminal, or wherever it is stored, is holding onto it until the time comes when he can get a better price.

Mr. President, the sooner the Executive order dealing with the corn situation is removed from the books in the executive department, the better it will be from the standpoint of the morale of the farmer, from the standpoint of producing more, and from the standpoint of bringing about the harmonious condition which should exist for the corn farmer in the corn sections throughout the Nation.

Mr. President, in my opinion, that is tremendously important. There is not a hog farmer in Illinois or Iowa or the Midwest, and there is not a cattle farmer in the Midwest who can feed parity corn at the price he is getting at the present time for the cattle and the hogs, and still make a handsome profit. The corn-hog ratio is out of all proportion, and the cattle-corn ratio is out of all proportion, and there is no reason why the one who is raising corn should not be able to get the parity price through the law of supply and demand. That is exactly what he wants, and he does not want a subsidy, he does not want a dole, if he can get away from it.

Mr. President, while I am on the subject I wish to make what seems to me a distinction between parity and the so-called subsidy we have been giving to the farmers all these years in the way of an adjustment. The farmer has not been able to get a parity price for his basic crops, and in order to meet that situation we said to the farmer, "If you will produce less we will adjust, so far as we can, with soil conservation and parity payments and benefit payments." So we paid him money to keep the surplus crops off the market.

We are sooner or later coming to a discussion of incentive payments. Incentive payments have been discussed in the House of Representatives. I wish to make one observation in respect to that matter. We have expended millions of dollars, yes, perhaps billions of dollars over a period of 10 years, to pay the farmer for producing less. Now there seems to be a considerable disturbance among the legislators in Washington about paying incentive payments in this great emergency for producing a little more toward the war effort. There is no question about giving the mineral producers of the West some $400,000,000 to produce more copper, more zinc, and more strategic and critical materials. That is not subsidy; that is just good business for the war effort; but when it comes to producing certain critical materials from the standpoint of food, which are basic and elemental and indispensable for the war effort, in line with what the Secretary of Agriculture says the country cannot stand incentive payments, and the farmer should not have the benefit of incentive payments because of that fact.

Mr. President, no one is more opposed to the basic principle of subsidies than is the Senator from Illinois, but we are in an all-out war. We have been in an economic war since 1932—and long before that. The President of the United States along with the farm leaders, back in 1932, worked out a farm program through the triple A, which gave to the farmers the adjustment payments, the benefit payments, and the soil conservation payments. They are nothing but subsidies, and God knows the farmer was glad to get those subsidies back in 1933, when the country was in the greatest economic depression and in the most chaotic condition that we have ever experienced in all our history.

Mr. President, some time ago when a new chairman of the Republican Committee was elected he made certain statements which I shall never forget. He said that he had been after the New Deal animal since 1932, and he hoped to be in on the kill in 1944.

Mr. President, the New Deal animal in 1932 had the courage and the vision and the intestinal fortitude to go out in that crisis and save the country from the great catastrophe we were abou to experience. During that time I talked to one of the greatest bankers in this country, one of the big businessmen, if you please, and he said "If I were President of the United States in this crisis I do not know what I could do to save the country."

Another individual who is worth millions upon millions of dollars today, one of the toughest opponents of this administration, said at that time, "If I can save 10 percent of my fortune in 1933; if someone will come to the front to aid me save only 10 percent of my millions, that is all I am asking." Such an individual did come to the front in 1933 and saved not only this man's millions but the country too, which was the important thing. The person who made the statement about being after the New Deal in 1932 comes from a State where individuals, distressed and angry, and sick and sore and lame as the result of the fallacies of the old deal, went out and took from the bench a judge who dared sign a decree of eviction in a foreclosure case, and threatened to hang him from the limb of the first tree they found.

Those are the conditions which existed when this new chairman was trying to "get" the New Deal in 1932. So these adjustment payments have been with us, Mr. President, for all these years. Democrats and Republicans alike, whether they came from the city or the farm, have consistently, in a nonpartisan spirit, voted for adjustment payments. They have recognized that agriculture is the basic industry in America, and that unless agriculture succeeds all other industry fails.

We now come to the point where the administration says it wants some incentive payments in order to bring about a little greater production and the old spirit of antagonism and captious criticism arises because they are incentive payments, because they are a subsidy. Many million dollars have been obtained through the R. F. C. to be used as subsidies for other industries. The farmers have taken billions in subsidies but at the moment it is popular to condemn and criticize and take issue with practically everything which is being done in the war effort so far as the home front is concerned. However, Mr. President, the chickens may come home to roost in connection with a good many of these petty and vindictive protests.

Mr. President, that is all I care to say.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to express my agreement with the Senator from Alabama and the very helpful suggestion made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

The subject under discussion is not a new one. After we passed the so-called Price Control Act of October 2, 1942, the interpretation put upon that act by Executive order and followed by the Office of Price Administration was so contrary to the understanding of many Senators who helped pass it that 21 Members of the Senate signed a letter directed to Mr. Leon Henderson. Among the signers of the letter were the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], who is not present today, and other Senators. There were 21 signers in all. The only reason why there were not 51, 61, or 71, was that the letter was not presented to that many. It was presented for signature to only 21 Senators.

In the letter we said exactly what the bill of the Senator from Alabama proposes. At that time we challenged the construction which had been placed upon the Price Control Act. I believe the challenge was fair. Last fall I helped to pass the Price Control Act. The interpretation subsequently placed upon the act went far beyond anything that ever occurred to me as being possible.

As the Senator from Tennessee has said, all we are now proposing to do is to reaffirm the position of the Congress. As a member of the so-called farm bloc, I believe that the time has perhaps come, or will come in the future, when we should recast the laws which affect the welfare of agriculture. I have repeatedly said that I shall be happy to participate in the revision when the time comes. The only question involved in the bill is whether the revision of the farm program shall be made by enactment of laws in Congress or by Executive order. That is all the bill of the Senator from Alabama means to me; and I will vote for it and support it because I think the place to amend, revise, and change laws is in the Congress.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I wish to make a few brief observations with respect to the subject now under discussion. I am not opposing the pending bill. I shall probably vote for it. However, I should like to discuss as briefly as possible the agricultural situation with respect to the laws which we have enacted dealing with farm prices, beginning in 1933.

It is unnecessary, and it would probably be unprofitable, to go into the historic, chronological development of agricultural legislation. For many years both political parties declared themselves in favor of farm legislation which would put the farmer on an economic equality with industry. That was a legitimate objective, and I voted for all the legislation which seemed to be heading in that direction. In the effort to accomplish that purpose I may have voted for many unsound agricultural proposals. However, we have all been more or less groping in the dark about what was the wisest thing to do with regard to agriculture.

Many persons throughout the country and many Members in both Houses of Congress have regarded agriculture as a sort of stepchild of the Government. Back in the Hoover administration Congress created what was known as the Farm Board. Before that time, in the Coolidge administration, Congress passed the McNary-Haugen bill, which was vetoed. I believe Congress repassed it in the Hoover administration, and it was again vetoed. Congress then passed the bill creating the Farm Board and appropriated $500,000,000 to be used by that Board to stabilize agriculture. I voted for all those bills because I never regarded the condition of the farmer as a partisan political situation or controversy.

In spite of our efforts the farmer continued to decline in his relationship to industry. In 1933 Congress passed the so-called triple A bill, which, after being enacted into law, operated for a while and was then declared to be unconstitutional. Congress then passed soil-conservation legislation, and so on. All our efforts were directed toward the objectives which were universally regarded as proper and wise—that of putting the farmer on an economic basis equal to that of industry.

In order to accomplish that object, we had to fix some period which would be fairly representative as between industry and agriculture. It was admittedly an arbitrary period. A period had to be fixed by law, during which the purchasing power of the farmer would be fairly representative as compared to industry and other elements of our population. In its wisdom Congress fixed the period between 1909 and 1914 as the 5-year period during which the income and purchasing power of the farmer, as compared with other elements of our country, was about as fair and representative as in any other period that could be selected. I believe that period was the most representative 5-year period which could have been selected in an effort to put agriculture on an economic equality with industry.

In the legislation which was proposed we had a formula called parity which was not a fixed term. It was not a static quantity. It was flexible. It had to be flexible because of the flexibility of wages and industrial prices. We conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture power to adjust the formula of parity, depending on the cost of industrial products which the farmer was compelled to buy, so that his purchasing power would be maintained on a parity approximately equal to the purchasing power during the period of 1909 to 1914.

The Agricultural Adjustment Act, the Domestic Allotment Act, and the Soil Conservation Act, were parts of the program. The Soil Conservation Act must be regarded in a distinct category from the Agricultural Adjustment Act. Soil conservation might proceed without regard to the triple A, because soil conservation is a problem which confronts our people without regard to the prices which may be received for agricultural products.

Soil conservation is the business of conserving our soil in order that each generation may be able to support itself on the land. We all know that as our population increases every acre of land must support more people than it did the year before. Therefore we had to bring a halt to the wastage of our soil, and we inaugurated the soil-conservation program.

As I understand, the bill of the Senator from Alabama has no effect whatever upon soil conservation or payments under the soil conservation law.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under the Executive order it has effect, because under the Executive order the soil-conservation payments have been deducted in determining the amount of the parity payments that the farmer would receive.

Mr. BARKLEY. That may be true. I am taking the two agricultural problems separately. Soil conservation does not of necessity have any relationship to benefit payments under the parity provisions of the law.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Many of us believe they are not benefit payments.

Mr. BARKLEY. Soil conservation payments are payments in a certain respect as a reward for the conservation of our soil.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; they are a help in conserving the soil.

Mr. BARKLEY. They are entirely separate from the benefit payments which are supposed to bridge the difference between market prices and parity, as we read it into the law.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is an exactly correct statement; yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. When we wrote the parity formula, we always assumed—and I think it was a correct assumption—that the purchasing power of the farmer should at all times be kept as nearly as possible in relationship to his purchasing power during the 5-year period from 1909 to 1914. In other words, benefit payments were supposed to bridge the difference between the market prices of the products provided for in the law and the prices which would be received if the formula were reached by market prices; and the benefit payments were supposed to make up the difference between actual market prices and the parity price which would be arrived at by an adjustment on the part of the Secretary of Agriculture, and which theoretically would be the price the farmer would receive if he were receiving parity at the market.

We wrote the first Price Control Act after long deliberation and many conferences. I have said here before, and I repeat now, that at the beginning of consideration of the first price-control bill those who represented agriculture insisted that in the fixing of maximum prices for farm products the maximum should not be below parity. As we went along in the consideration of the first price-control bill—and, even before the bill was introduced, in the many conferences which took place, and in which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and the Chairman of the House of Representatives Committee on Banking and Currency, Mr. STEAGALL, participated—and in the consideration of what really should be done relative to the matter of agricultural products, we finally came to the conclusion that, in view of the differences which existed in respect to many agricultural commodities, we should set a price higher than parity. In fixing a minimum-maximum—which is rather a contradictory term, but that is really what it was—we went to 110 percent of parity instead of parity, and we wrote into the law originally that when we fixed a minimum price or a maximum price for agricultural products it could not go below 110 percent of parity.

In the process of writing the legislation we had, in a sense, three alternatives: The price could not go below the price represented either by parity or the price which prevailed on October 1, 1941, or on December 15, 1941, whichever was the highest—and as to which, of course, we gave agricultural products the benefit of all the doubts. We gave them the highest of the three prices determined among those three categories.

In all the first price-control act nothing was said about what should be done in regard to benefit payments. I think that was because of the theory that whenever, by any natural process, prices reached parity, benefit payments ceased anyway. The only theory upon which we ever paid benefit payments under the Agricultural Adjustment Act was that in order to put agriculture on approximately an even keel with industry the Government would make up the difference. In the first instance it was to be done by a processing tax, not by the ordinary methods of taxation. We started out to raise the money necessary to put agriculture on an economic basis equal with that of industry, by charging a processing tax. However, that method was declared to be unconstitutional. Then we adopted a different method; but the whole theory was that so long as the prices for the basic commodities were below what we had written into the law as parity, the difference should be made up by an appropriation out of the Treasury of money which was to be put there by some method of taxation—a method which we had to change after the Supreme Court's decision. The whole theory was that whenever the prices on their own merits—each agricultural tub standing on its own bottom—reached those parity prices, the benefit payments should cease.

But, strange to say, in the first price-control act and in the second price-control act Congress said nothing whatever about what should be done in regard to benefit payments with respect to price ceilings which should be fixed by the Administrator on agricultural products or on other products processed from agricultural products.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator has referred to benefit payments, and has stated that when the price for the commodity reached parity the benefit payments should cease. That is true as to parity payments; but with respect to the payment of soil conservation payments the price the farmer receives for his product has no effect whatever.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is correct; the Senator stated that.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator said they were entitled to the benefit payments; but under the Executive order which has been issued, soil-conservation payments which are paid for specific services performed by the farmer also are deducted before the price for the agricultural commodity has actually reached the price ceiling.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is correct; but I have always said that, as I understood it, benefit payments and soil-conservation payments are in entirely different categories.

Mr. RUSSELL. Exactly.

Mr. BARKLEY. And even though the prices for the basic agricultural commodities set out in the Agricultural Adjustment Act should be reached, soil-conservation payments would still be made.

Mr. RUSSELL. They have no relation to parity.

Mr. BARKLEY. They should still be made to those who engage in the soil-conservation program.

Mr. RUSSELL. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. And to those who are entitled to payments under that program because they are seeking to conserve the fertility of our soil.

Mr. RUSSELL. I regret that I did not understand the Senator's position on the matter.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; I tried to make that distinction.

I myself would regard it as regrettable if agriculture—and I do not believe that agriculture as a whole takes any such position—if agriculture as a whole should now, in the midst of a great world war, say, "Not only do we want to receive parity payments or parity prices on the market for the commodities we produce, but we want to receive more than parity; we want the Government still to pay the benefit payments," which in my judgment cannot be done under the law when parity prices are reached.

That is not the same situation at all as fixing maximum prices on agricultural products. We said they should not go below 110 percent of parity or two other prices, whichever was the highest. I come from a farm State, and during my 30 years of service in the two Houses of Congress I have—as I have repeatedly stated here—voted for every measure which seemed to be headed in the direction of putting agriculture on an economic basis equal with that of industry, according to the program and the promises of both political parties over a period of 30 years.

There can be no doubt that there is confusion in the law. When Congress passed the first price-control law it said nothing about what should be done as to benefit payments, or whether they should be deducted. Probably Congress proceeded on the theory that everyone understood that whenever prices reached parity, of course the benefit payments ceased, and their payment did not constitute a part of the policy at all.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In other words, they were not paid.

Mr. BARKLEY. Exactly; they were not paid.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But they did not affect the parity price.

Mr. BARKLEY. Not at all. They were not paid. In other words, the Government did not have to make up the difference between the parity prices and the prices the farmer was receiving; and that matter was, again, separate from the ceiling which the Office of Price Administration put on—which added to the confusion, I readily admit. I think that confusion is not only in existence among the farmers themselves but in the Senate and in the House of Representatives. So many different laws on the subject have been passed that there is legitimate confusion; and the situation is a complicated one. As to that there can be no doubt. The situation is complicated; and I doubt whether anyone can ever get the thing down to a gnat's eye, as we say in the country, to determine fractionally what can or should be done in order to eradicate the confusion which has existed.

I shall not take the time of the Senate to read all of the first Price Control Act; but in section 3 we really provided a floor to a ceiling. That is an inconsistent term, but that is really what it amounts to. We put a floor under the ceiling. We said, "You cannot go below a certain thing as a ceiling. You may go as high above that as possible, but you cannot go below it." That was 110 percent of parity or the highest of the prices prevailing on October 1, 1941, or December 15, 1941, or the average price for such commodity during the period July 1, 1919, to June 30, 1929. There were four different categories there.

In section 3 of the last Price Control Act we provided—and there is some inconsistency between the language of the two acts; I do not think anyone realized it—

> No maximum price shall be established or maintained for any agricultural commodity under authority of this act or otherwise below a price which will reflect to producers of agricultural commodities the higher of the following prices, as determined and published by the Secretary of Agriculture—
> (1) The parity price for such commodity (adjusted by the Secretary of Agriculture—

And so forth. In this act we set 110 percent of parity, but in the last one we set parity, which was an inconsistency between the two acts.

Mr. BANKHEAD. This act, however, suspends section 3 of the original act so far as they are in conflict.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true. Therefore the last act practically repealed the 110-percent provision of parity as carried in the first act.

> (1) The parity price for such commodity (adjusted by the Secretary of Agriculture for grade, location, and seasonal differentials)—

Still nothing is said about benefit payments—> or, in case a comparable price has been determined for such commodity under and in accordance with the provisions of section 3 (b) of the Emergency Price Control Act of 1942, such comparable price (adjusted in the same manner), or

> (2) The highest price received by such producers for such commodity between January 1, 1942, and September 15, 1942 (adjusted by the Secretary of Agriculture for grade, location, and seasonal differentials), or, if the market for such commodity was inactive during the latter half of such period, a price for the commodity determined by the Secretary of Agriculture to be in line with the prices, during such period, of other agricultural commodities produced for the same general use.

That set a different standard, a somewhat different basis in its variations from the standard fixed in the first act, which no doubt has contributed to the confusion which exists in the minds of many able people about what really ought to be done in regard to benefit payments.

I think it ought to be said, in fairness to the President, that his attitude all along has been that in the consideration and in the fixing of minimum-maximum prices for agricultural products and other products manufactured from agricultural products benefit payments ought not to be added to the price in order that a minimum-maximum might be fixed. That has been the President's attitude all along; it has been a consistent attitude; and it can be justified on the ground that, originally, we did not intend that the Government should step in and make payments to farmers where parity was received in the process of marketing under the old rule of supply and demand.

In other words, if agricultural products reached parity the benefit payments which would otherwise have been paid ought not to be added to that parity price in fixing the minimum below which the Price Administrator could not go. The President has been consistent about that, and, therefore, in the interpretation of the last act which still did not mention benefit payments, which still charted no course by which the Administrator could be guided in fixing minimum prices or maximum prices for agricultural products, the President, in harmony with his consistent attitude on the subject, and, I suppose, under his advice and direction, the Price Administrator, by this Executive order, deducted not only benefit payments but soil conservation payments from consideration in fixing the maximum ceiling, as we call it, for agricultural products and other commodities made of agricultural products.

I think that the Congress probably was remiss, or it may be it was negligent, or it may be it did not realize the situation when it failed to make clear what ought to be done with regard to benefit payments. I do not understand that the bill of the Senator from Alabama, in effect, will provide that benefit payments, or theoretical benefit payments, shall be added on top of the formula we have fixed in both these laws in determining what the ceiling on agricultural products shall be. Am I correct about that?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; the bill merely provides that they shall not be deducted.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand it provides that such payments shall not be deducted, and that would mean that in fixing a ceiling where any commodity had not yet reached parity, or even where it had reached parity, neither the actual payment should be deducted from that price nor the theoretical payment added to it in determining what should be the maximum ceiling.

Mr. BANKHEAD. This bill has nothing to do with what are to be considered in fixing either the minimum or the ceiling price. It prohibits such a thing as certain deductions being made.

Mr. BARKLEY. As I said awhile ago, it is a complicated, involved subject, and is not easy for anybody to understand the laws and say that all on the right belongs in one category and all on the left belongs in another.

I am not, as I have said, opposing the bill of the Senator from Alabama; I intend to vote for it; but I wish to issue a warning, and I do it as a friend of the farmer.

I own a little farm. My father died at the age of 78 years, and all his life he was a farmer. So I have had the farmer's background during my entire life. I went through the last war, and I saw what happened to the farmers at the end of the last war. When wheat was bringing $2.50 a bushel many of our enthusiastic agriculturists who saw that looked upon it as a mirage and convinced themselves that the price would never go down again, insisted that wheat be held for $3 a bushel, and some of them insisted that we pass a law providing that wheat should not bring less than $3 a bushel.

Many of them held their wheat for $3 a bushel and sold it for 50 cents a bushel when the war was over. Many of them bought large farms. They traded in their small farms, on which they had been happy and satisfied all their lives, as the first payment on large farms, because they saw this mirage and did not realize that the debacle was inevitable, as it came a few years later; and so they lost their small farms and as well their large farms. That contributed very largely, in my judgment, to the agricultural crisis which developed in this country and which made necessary all the legislation, which is more or less artificial in a sense, dealing with agricultural products. I do not want that thing to happen again. I do not want our agricultural people to become so enthusiastic over future high prices that they will bring about or force us to bring about an unsound situation. I know they do not want to do it; but farmers, as a rule, are not economists; they spend every waking hour at work; they have not enough time to study the intricacies of economics and of prices, and usually they take what they can get when they take their products to market. I do not want them to be led on by any mirage of apparently high prices to the extent they were 25 years ago and find that they have built up an artificial situation from which they must descend in the years that will follow this war. I do not want to take any action which might bring about even approximately the same disastrous situation which resulted after the last war, which many of us remember.

I shall vote for the pending bill because I think Congress has the right to fix the formula; I think it has a right to say what shall be the standard in any legislation it enacts. It has not done so; it has left it in confusion. The President has been consistent in his attitude on the subject, and where Congress left it in confusion the President had a right, in my judgment, to put his own interpretation upon it according to his own theory of agricultural fairness and justice.

There may be other forms of legislation dealing with the subject of agriculture which will come before us, but I hope that we may here utter a word of caution that may be heard and heeded throughout our country against taking advantage of a temporary inflationary period to bring about an artificial situation which may again result in untold harm to the agricultural industry of the United States. It is largely because I wish to utter such a word of warning and caution that I have taken the time of the Senate to discuss this proposed legislation.

I appreciate the sincerity of the Senator from Alabama in undertaking to clear up this situation. I shall vote for the bill with some trepidation, I will say frankly. I am not absolutely certain, and none of us could claim to be absolutely certain that we have been doing the right thing in any of our agricultural legislation. We have been, more or less, groping in the dark; but I hope that the passage of this bill will not be regarded as an indication that the Senate and the House of Representatives do not seriously consider the possibility of another run-away inflation, that we do not ignore the rights of other people in this country, but that we realize that those who work for wages and those who live in cities have some rights in the matter of legislation which will affect the prices they must pay for commodities they are compelled to buy.

I realize that there are many avenues and many phases of the agricultural situation and farm labor which I do not think have any immediate or direct relationship to the pending bill, matters in which we are all interested, about which we may have to do something, but it cannot be done in connection with the proposed legislation.

The problems of the farmer are serious, and in many cases distressing, though not so much because the Army has taken all the men from the farm. When I was at home recently I had a conference with farmers in my county, who told me that in that county for every man taken by the Army three men had been taken by industry, and they went into industry because of the higher wages paid to labor in plants producing war materials. That all raises a very difficult problem, namely, as to what we can do by law about the matter. Can we say by law that a young man on the farm, or an old man, or a middle-aged man, shall not go to a city where he can make two or three times as much in wages, in the hope that he may save something and, when he comes back to the farm, after the war, have a little nest egg, something to go on? Can we do that by law? I myself doubt that we can. Yet the great injury to agricultural labor in this country has been the result of the high wages paid in industrial plants, and not so much because of the drafting of farm labor. That question may come up later in connection with other proposals, and I do not wish to discuss it now. I merely mention it as one of the problems we must face.

I hope that the passage of the pending bill will not be regarded by any one as affording a license to get all that can be gotten out of the war, with respect to the prices of all commodities, whether produced by agriculture or industry. In the expression of that hope, and with that caution, which I feel in my own heart I should utter, I expect to vote for the bill.

Mr. GILLETTE obtained the floor.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. Of course.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Before the Senator enters upon a discussion of the general features of the bill, I wonder if he could be of assistance to some of us who are trying to understand the challenge before us, many of us who are not on the committee, and who are not intimately familiar with the structure of the law.

Will the Senator give us a simple, mathematical example of the way the present system works adversely to the farmer, and how under the proposed legislation the correction will be made?

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, the Senator does me honor overmuch in thinking that I can contribute to lessening the confusion; but I will say to him that I shall, in 5 or 10 minutes, try to draw a brief picture of the situation as I see it, and I will do so in words of one syllable, because I am at home with words of one syllable, and with no other language.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does it take 5 or 10 minutes to present an exhibit to demonstrate what we are talking about?

Mr. GILLETTE. Perhaps I can do it in less, but I shall try to give an explanation, at least.

Let us take this picture: If there are produced on the Senator's farm 100 bushels of corn a year, and there is a market for but 60 bushels, we will say, there are 40 bushels too much raised. I shall return to the parity price in a moment, but let us assume that the price has been fixed at a parity relationship, that the price per bushel is $1. If the Senator produces 100 bushels of corn and can sell it at a dollar per bushel, he has $100. But there being a market for but 60 bushels, we are faced with a farm problem such as we have been faced with for years.

One group—the production-control group—says that the thing to do is to cut down the production to 60 bushels. That is production control. Another group says, "Produce the 100 bushels and take 40 bushels off the market by some machinery." That is surplus control. Another group says, "Produce the hundred bushels, and enlarge the market by developing new markets and new uses." That is known as expanded-utilization plan. That is the third group. We have a combination of the production-control and surplus-control groups in our present machinery.

We said in the original farm act, which was declared to be unconstitutional, "Cut down your production to 60 bushels of corn and we will compensate you. We will raise the money by a processing tax and we will compensate you." The Supreme Court said that the Federal Congress had no authority to do that in that way.

Then we enacted the Soil Conservation Act, and accomplished the same thing by going "around Robin Hood's barn" to secure reduced production. We said, "Take enough of your acreage out of production so that you will raise 60 bushels and we will pay you for putting that acreage into soybeans, or alfalfa, or other soil-building crops. We are not paying you for curtailing your acreage. We are paying you for building up the soil in the other acres, and we hope by the reduced production to raise the price so that your per unit price will be in a parity relationship. This means a parity price for the 60 bushels you have to sell."

Granted that that is accomplished, the Senator would have 60 bushels to sell, and he would get $60. From the benefit payments he would get the conservation payment for the corn he did not raise, which has nothing to do with the price per unit.

In the original act we defined what parity was.

> Parity as applied to the price of any agricultural commodity shall be that price for the commodity which will give to the commodity purchasing power with respect to articles the farmer buys equivalent to the purchasing power of that commodity.

Then we made this definition:

> Parity as applied to income shall be the per capita net income of individuals on farms from all farming operations.

In my opinion that is what confuses some of those who have chosen to interpret the matter. All we allowed such a farmer as I have been supposing was $60, if we could bring it up to the parity price. Any conservation payment had no bearing whatever on the price. It was to compensate for what the farmer did not raise, and supplement his income.

We took the further position, "Well, if we do all that, perhaps the price will not come up in the market even with that curtailment. It is a voluntary agreement, perhaps not a sufficient number of farmers will go in, and there will still be too much corn, and the price will go down." Then we said, "If and when, even after all these efforts, the market price for one of these basic commodities does not reach a parity figure, if and when that situation prevails, and if and when the Congress of the United States makes money available, we can supplement the income by a parity payment apportioned among the basic commodities in the proportion that they are below a parity price."

Now I come to the Price Control Act. Many of the farm commodities, principally the grains, were below a parity price notwithstanding these efforts. Then we adopted a price-control act, and it was amended, and the amendment to the present law read:

> No maximum price shall be established or maintained for any agricultural product—

Not income, but price for the commodity—

> under authority of this act which does not reflect to producers of the agricultural commodity from which it is processed—

A number of alternative prices, including the parity price.

After that was enacted, the President, by Executive order, said that in determining the parity price of a commodity in the market—of corn, for instance, using it as an example—a farmer shall not deduct what he received in benefit payments—that is, conservation payments—and they were included notwithstanding the suggestion which has been made here. Parity payments and conservation payments, have no relationship whatever, especially the conservation payments, to the price of the commodity in the market.

The proposal before us today merely says what was heretofore stated in the law in relation to determining the parity price per unit for the commodity. I shall refer, in that connection, to an additional provision. We said, in the parity price provision set out in the Price Control Act, that no ceiling price should be placed on flour, for instance, which did not reflect to the wheat grower a parity price, merely applies to basic commodities, corn, wheat, cotton, rice, tobacco, and peanuts. So we added this provision:

> No maximum price shall be established or maintained for any commodity processed in whole or in substantial part from any agricultural commodity—

Going into the whole field of production of agricultural commodities—

> below a price which will allow the producer a comparable price.

To take the position now that in determining a comparable or parity price for a particular commodity in the market—which is the number of units produced times the price received for the commodity—there can be deducted a conservation payment, or a parity payment, or any other type of benefit payment, is to bring an element and factor into the situation that has no more relation to a parity price or a comparable price than the King of Siam has to our Government in the United States of America. All in the world the bill of the Senator from Alabama proposes to do, as every Senator knows, is to make that point clear, and to abrogate, in effect, the regulation issued by the executive department. The bill simply enunciates what ought to be apparent to everyone, that in determining the parity price—not income—no deduction shall be made for subsidy payments, and so forth.

In the first place, the Agricultural Adjustment Act reservation does not relate to anything but the basic crops, and the man who is not under the program, who does not choose to come in, does not obtain any of the conservation or benefit payments. The thousands of farmers who are outside the commercial corn areas do not get such payments. Those payments are not part of their income, and cannot be. Thousands and hundreds of thousands of those who are raising other commodities are not benefited by such payments.

The statement contained in the bill of the Senator from Alabama simply makes the matter so clear that no one in the future can misconstrue it. It makes a clear, definite, concrete, candid statement of what the Congress wants; that in determining parity price—not income—or comparable price for any agricultural commodity manufactured in whole or substantial part, no deduction shall be made for subsidy payments, conservation payments, parity payments, and so forth.

Mr. President, I realize my 9 minutes are about up, but in the half minute remaining I wish to say that I cannot for the life of me see why it should be necessary to present in the United States Congress a bill of this kind, and enact it into law, but from the interpretation which has been made, and from the confusion which has resulted therefrom, it became necessary, and I compliment the Senator from Alabama upon presenting his bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, if I may I will return to my inquiry. The Senator from Iowa started me out on a farm with 100 bushels of corn, of which I was going to be able to sell 60 bushels.

Mr. GILLETTE. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. He left me there and proceeded to make the situation clear, definite, concrete, and candid. I wonder if the Senator can add to the illumination, at least to the extent of showing me, with my 100 bushels of corn, in dollars and cents what is involved on the one hand by way of penalty under the Executive order and on the other hand by way of correction under the pending legislation. Is that possible, or can it be simplified to that extent?

Mr. GILLETTE. I think it can. The Senator from Michigan admits that I brought him up to the point he just mentioned. Then the President of the United States says, in an Executive order, "The price of your corn is not a dollar a bushel in the market, and on corn which is turned into hominy grits and into breakfast foods we can put a ceiling price, which makes it unnecessary for you to receive a dollar for your corn. Why? Because you have received parity payments or conservation payments for not raising the other 40 bushels. Consequently we do not have to give you a dollar a bushel for your 60 bushels. You have already received a conservation payment."

Is that clear?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The conservation payment is related to the 40 bushels which I did not raise rather than to the 60 bushels I am trying to sell?

Mr. GILLETTE. Absolutely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). The bill is still before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I think we should have a record vote on the bill, so I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama if it be his true intent, through the pending bill, to speak the congressional purpose and intent?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is my purpose.

Mr. DANAHER. And, of course, the Senator from Alabama would further feel that any Executive order, or purported Executive order, which would fly in the face of the congressional intent, should be corrected by legislative action in this way?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is what I have stated. The bill so indicates on its face.

Mr. DANAHER. The Senator may recall that on various occasions during 1942 there was discussed the matter of an Executive order which would place a limitation on salaries to be earned by any person in the amount of $25,000 per annum after the payment of taxes. Congress refused to pass any such legislation. It was generally felt throughout Congress that any such legislation should be general and apply alike to money earned and money derived from inheritance or income from investments, as distinguished from salary. Therefore, Congress having enacted a rule of general application under the tax legislation, when the so-called stabilization bill came along I am sure it was generally felt that under the language of that particular legislation there was no room for an Executive order.

So, Mr. President, as the Senator from Alabama has said, in order to execute the true intent of Congress, I should like to ask him how he would feel about an amendment which would add a new section 2 to the bill. The proposed section would read as follows:

SEC. 2. No department, bureau, instrumentality, or other agency of the executive branch of the Government shall enforce any penalty under, and no person shall suffer loss because of any attempted enforcement of, the terms of Executive Order No. — of October 2, 1942, insofar as such order purports to limit the salary of any person to be earned in any one year to $25,000 after the payment of taxes.

Does the Senator from Alabama feel that he can accept that amendment in behalf of the committee?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The two subjects are so far afield that there is no reason in the world to commingle them. Of course, I cannot accept the proposed amendment. I agree with the Senator from Connecticut that we did not intend to give the President such power. If the question should arise in the way in which the pending matter is brought up, in a separate bill to substitute a tax for the Executive order, I should support such a measure; but the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut ought not to be injected into this farm measure. I hope the Senator will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, my purpose is, as the Senator from Alabama properly concedes, to see to it that the congressional intent in this particular is executed under the proposed section 2, just as the Senator from Alabama would have it executed in accordance with section 1 of the bill. I believe that the two sections would fit together like a pair of gloves. They would properly reflect the congressional intent in both particulars. In my opinion, the Senator from Alabama would be well advised to accept the amendment on behalf of the committee, and I hope he can be prevailed upon to accept it. However, if the Senator thinks that the amendment should not be a part of the bill, and refuses to accept it, I offer the amendment and send it to the desk to be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK of Missouri in the chair). The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words on the pending amendment.

There is now pending in the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives a bill which would raise the debt limit. I believe that an amendment dealing with this subject has been agreed to by the committee, and will soon come up in the House when the bill is called up for consideration. If the bill comes over to the Senate with such a provision in it, the Senate Finance Committee and the Senate will have to deal with it, and act upon it.

In addition to that bill, there will be another tax bill before us in a very short time. The Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives is now considering such a bill. We shall have to deal with the proposal in some tax bill, where the subject is appropriate and germane. When those bills come to us and we begin to consider them on their merits, I am sure they will receive the consideration to which they are entitled. I am sure that all Senators will vote their convictions on the subject whenever it is appropriate to do so. Certainly we should not complicate the pending legislation, dealing with one particular phase of the farm situation, by undertaking summarily to repeal, without committee consideration, an Executive order on the subject issued by the President, without regard to the merits of the question, on which I make no declaration. When we reach that subject in an appropriate bill I shall vote my convictions upon it.

Regardless of how I shall vote on such a proposal in the tax bill when the time comes, I certainly hope it will not be added to the pending bill, thereby complicating the farm situation.

Mr. President, I hope that the Senator from Connecticut, in whose sincerity and ability I always have great confidence, will not insist on the proposed amendment as a part of the pending bill. Before long he will have an opportunity to vote on the same question.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, as the Senator from Kentucky knows, I have great confidence in his judgment. I appreciate the expression of his anxiety and interest in connection with the matter under discussion. However, so far as his argument seems to stem from his belief that the proposed amendment has not had committee consideration, I respectfully refresh his recollection. We assuredly considered it in the Committee on Banking and Currency when the stabilization bill was before us. Not only did we consider it, but we refused to put language in the bill which would have made the Executive order possible.

I should like to have the Senator from Kentucky refresh his recollection in that particular and have it made perfectly clear that we did give the amendment consideration and refused to write it into the bill. Not only did we refuse to put it into the bill in the committee, but we did not put it into the bill when it was before the Senate.

Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Alabama has said to me personally, and on the floor of the Senate, that he is in favor of attainment of the objectives which I seek by the proposed amendment. I assume from the attitude and expressions of the Senator from Kentucky that he believes the proposed legislation will be in better shape and more germane to the general subject without the amendment. In the light of the representations of my distinguished colleagues I am willing to withdraw the amendment and allow the bill to come to a vote in its present form.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thank the Senator from Connecticut. My recollection does not need any refreshing on the subject of what happened in the Committee on Banking and Currency with respect to this subject. Frankly, the proposal was considered in the committee and rejected. However, in the bill as it was finally enacted, there is language which might give color to the contention that we did not fully reject it. Be that as it may, the Finance Committee also considered the subject when it had before it the last tax bill and did not include it. I recall that. But the amendment which has been offered by the able Senator from Connecticut to repeal an Executive order, was not given consideration. The committee which has been giving consideration to it in the other House has worked out a modification. How that modification will appeal to the Senate, I do not know.

It will be entitled to consideration on its merits; and I assure the distinguished Senator from Connecticut that it will receive consideration on its merits. I again thank him for withdrawing his amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to add to what has been stated by the able Senator from Connecticut and the able Senator from Alabama. I share the feelings of both of them. These two things stem from the same source. The President did not have power by Executive order either to effect parity prices on agricultural commodities or to issue the order which was issued with respect to the limitation of salaries.

I will say to the Senator from Connecticut that whenever the question comes before the Senate I shall be with him. I hope that Senators who have the feeling that the President has exceeded his powers in both instances will vote for the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to amendment.

If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BANKHEAD (when Mr. BILBO's name was called). The senior Senator from Mississippi is necessarily absent. I am privileged to announce that, if present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHANDLER]. I understand that he would vote as I am about to vote. Therefore, I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mrs. CARAWAY (when Mr. MCCLELLAN's name was called). My colleague the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WHITE (when Mr. MCNARY's name was called). The senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] is unavoidably absent. He is suffering from a slight cold. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. BANKHEAD (when Mr. SHIPSTEAD's name was called). The senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] is necessarily absent. He requested, in the event a vote were taken before he returned, that I announce that if he were present he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HILL. I announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is absent from the Senate because of illness.

The Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK] are detained on official business for the Senate. I am advised that if present and voting, the Senator from California and the Senator from Utah would vote "yea."

The Senators from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS and Mr. PEPPER], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHANDLER], the Senator from Texas [Mr. O'DANIEL], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] are necessarily absent. I am advised that if present and voting, those Senators would vote "yea."

Mr. WHITE. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is detained on official business.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] is necessarily absent.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] is unavoidably detained. If present, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 78, nays 2, as follows:

So the bill (S. 660) was passed.

PREVENTION OF SPECULATION IN LANDS OF THE COLUMBIA BASIN PROJECT

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LA FOLLETTE in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate a bill coming over from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. 839) to amend the act approved May 27, 1937 (ch. 269, 50 Stat. 208), by providing substitute and additional authority for the prevention of speculation in land of the Columbia Basin project, and substitute and additional authority related to the settlement and development of the project, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which has just been laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, on February 15 the Senate passed Senate bill 408 proposing certain amendments to the reclamation law by providing substitute and additional authority for the prevention of speculation in lands of the Columbia Basin project. The bill was transmitted to the House. It has been lying there ever since the 15th of February. Yesterday the House passed a companion bill. There are differences between the two. In order that the two bills may go to conference, I move that all the language of the House bill following the enacting clause be stricken out, and that the language of the Senate bill, as passed by this body on February 15 be substituted, and that conferees be appointed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That the act of May 27, 1937 (ch. 269, 50 Stat. 208), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SECTION 1. In addition to the primary purposes for which the Grand Coulee Dam project (hereafter to be known as the Columbia Basin project and herein called the 'project') was authorized under the provision of the act of August 30, 1935 (49 Stat. 1028), the project is hereby authorized and reauthorized as a project subject to the Reclamation Project Act of 1939; and the provisions of each of those two acts together with the provisions of this act shall govern the repayment of expenditures and the construction, operation, and maintenance of the works constructed as a part of the project.

"SEC. 2. (a) No part of the funds heretofore or hereafter appropriated or allotted for project construction or for the reclamation of land within the project shall be expended in the construction of any irrigation features of the project, exclusive of Grand Coulee Dam and appurtenant works now under construction and of the pumping plant and equalizing reservoir and dams, until the requirements of the following subdivisions (i) and (ii) of this subsection (a) have been met:

"(i) All lands within the project shall have been impartially appraised by the Secretary of the Interior (hereinafter called the 'Secretary') and evaluated at the date of appraisal without reference to or increment on account of the construction of the project. Reappraisals may be made at any time by the Secretary, and will be made upon the request of the landowner concerned accompanied by an advance to the United States of $15 for each quarter section or fraction thereof involved, on account of expense thereof. In such reappraisals the Secretary shall take into account, in addition to the value found in the first appraisal, improvements made after said appraisal, such irrigation construction charges on the land as have been paid, and other items of value that are proper, other than increments on account of the construction of the project. The term 'appraised value' as used in this act shall mean appraised values determined as provided in this subsection.

"(ii) Contracts shall have been made with irrigation, reclamation, or conservancy districts organized under State law embracing the lands within the project providing for payment thereby of that part of the cost of construction of the project determined by the Secretary to be the part thereof to be repaid by irrigation. Each such contract shall conform to the requirements of this act, shall require repayment within the maximum period permitted under the act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stat. 388), and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto (hereinafter called the Federal reclamation laws), and provide that payments shall be enforceable by all means and remedies provided in said laws.

"(b) (i) The lands within the project shall be developed in irrigation blocks, as that term is defined in the Reclamation Project Act of 1939. The Secretary shall segregate the lands in each irrigation block into farm units of sufficient acreage for the support of an average-sized family at a suitable living level, having in mind the character of soil, topography, location with respect to the irrigation system, and such other relevant factors as, in his judgment, enter into the determination of the area and boundaries thereof; and shall establish the units as hereafter provided. No farm unit shall contain more than 160 or less than 10 acres of irrigable land, except that any nominal quarter section comprising more than 160 acres of irrigable land may be included in one farm unit, and except that lands owned by the United States may be established into units of lesser size for part-time farming purposes.

"(ii) Prior to the initial delivery of water to an irrigation block, the Secretary shall prepare a plat of all the farm units in the irrigation block and shall publish a notice of the intention to establish such farm unit plat in six weekly issues of a newspaper of general circulation in the county or counties in which any part of the irrigation block is located. From the date of first publication, a copy of the plat shall be available in the county auditor's office of each of said counties for public inspection during the business hours of the office. Any interested landowner shall have the right to file written objections to the plat with the county auditor of the county in which his lands are situated before the close of the period of publication. After expiration of the period of publication the Secretary shall consider and determine all such objections, draw the plat in final form and file it for record in said county auditor's office. With the consent of the owners of all farm units affected, the Secretary may revise the plat or any part thereof from time to time, and place the revisions of record with the original plat.

"(iii) Water shall not be delivered from, through, or by means of the project works to or for lands not conforming in area and boundaries to the farm units covering the lands involved, nor to or for more than one farm unit held by any one landowner, except that as to lands held by the one having equitable or legal title on May 27, 1937, or the heir or devisee of such owner, delivery may be made to or for a total irrigable area not exceeding the maximum provided in this section. The limitations of this subdivision shall not apply to lands owned by the United States or any agency or instrumentality thereof, corporate or otherwise.

"(iv) Lands within the project in excess of one farm unit held by any one landowner shall, except as otherwise provided in this act, be deemed excess land: Provided, That if excess land is acquired by foreclosure or other process of law, by conveyance in satisfaction of mortgages, by inheritance or by devise, water therefor may be furnished temporarily for a period not exceeding 5 years from the effective date of such acquisition, delivery of water thereafter ceasing until the transfer thereof to a landowner duly qualified to secure water therefor.

"(v) As used in this act, the terms 'owner,' 'landowner', and 'any one landowner' denote any person, corporation, joint-stock association, or family; the term 'family' denotes a group consisting of either or both husband and wife, together with their children under 18 years of age, or all of such children if both parents are dead; the term 'their children' includes the issue and lawfully adopted children of either or both husband and wife; and the term 'lands within the project' denotes those lands within the boundaries of the existing Columbia Basin irrigation districts, or revisions thereof approved by the Secretary, which the Secretary determines may be supplied water from, through, or by means of the project works and are required to be included to provide for sound development and operation of the project. Lands shall be deemed to be held by a family, if held as separate property of husband or wife, or constitute a part or all of their community property, or if they are the property of any or all of their children under 18 years of age.

"(c) As a condition precedent to receiving water from the project and in consideration thereof, each landowner shall be required to execute, within 6 months from the date of the execution of the contract between the United States and the district within which the land is located, a recordable contract covering all his lands within that district, agreeing as to such lands for and on behalf of himself, his heirs, successors, and assigns to the provisions set forth in this subsection (c): Provided, That any landowner, having failed to execute such a contract within this period, may be permitted to execute such contract within 1 year after the date of judicial confirmation of the validity of the contract between the United States and the district but only in accordance with such rules and regulations as may be prescribed under section 8 concerning this privilege.

"Each such recordable contract shall provide—

"(i) That the landowner will conform his lands by purchase, sale, or exchange at the appraised values to the area and boundaries of the pertinent farm unit or units shown on the plats filed under subsection 2 (b) and will dispose of excess land then or thereafter owned by him at its appraised value; that the Secretary is thereby given an irrevocable power of attorney to sell in behalf of the landowner any such excess land at said appraised value; and that the United States is thereby given, without further consideration, an option to buy any such excess land at said appraised value: Provided, That sales under such power or such option, unless otherwise provided in writing by said owner, shall be only for cash and only such that surrender of possession by the owner of any area of excess lands then operated as a single unit for dry farming or grazing may be effected substantially at one time.

"(ii) That in the period from the date of execution thereof and to a date 5 years from the time water becomes available for the lands covered thereby, no conveyance of or contract to convey a freehold estate in such lands, whether excess or nonexcess lands, shall be made for a consideration exceeding its appraised value, and in connection with any conveyance of, or contract to convey, such an estate within such period the grantor or vendor or the grantee or vendee or any lien holder thereof shall, within 30 days from the date of such conveyance or contract, file in the office of the county auditor in the county or counties in which the land is located an affidavit describing the conveyance or contract and the consideration therefor.

"(iii) That in the event that within such period such a conveyance of, or contract to convey, is made without filing within said 30 days the affidavit required in (ii) of this subsection, or is made for a consideration in excess of the appraised value, the Secretary, at any time within 2 years of the day on which there is filed for recording in the official country records the contract or deed involved, whichever is filed earliest in the event both the contract and deed are filed in a given transaction, may cancel the right of such estate to receive water from, through, or by means of the project works by a written notice of cancelation: Provided, That said power to cancel as to any given parcel of land may be waived by the Secretary at any time within said 2-year period by a written notice of waiver: And provided further, That after any such cancelation a project water right for the estate involved may be acquired only on terms and conditions satisfactory to the Secretary.

"(iv) That should any freehold estate in land covered thereby be conveyed or contracted to be conveyed within the period defined in (ii) of this subsection, the transaction, and any mortgage or other lien covering any deferred consideration thereunder, shall be subject to all the provisions of subsection 3 (b) hereof.

"Any or all of the provisions of this subsection (c) required to be included in the recordable contracts may be made covenants running with the land when said recordable contracts expressly so provide.

"(d) Each contract made pursuant to subdivision 2 (a) (ii) shall provide that no water will be delivered from, through, or by means of the project works except in accordance with the provisions and limitations of section 2 hereof.

"(e) Each district contract may include provisions—

"(i) Requiring that all lands within the district not covered by recordable contracts provided for under subsection (c) or otherwise not eligible to receive water shall be subject to assessment in the same manner and to the same extent as like lands eligible to receive water, subject to such provisions as the Secretary may prescribe for postponement in payment of all or part of such assessments but not beyond the expiration of the period during which the price limit under subsection 2 (c) applies.

"(ii) That, without compliance with other provisions of State law for the exclusion of lands, lands may be withdrawn from the district by filing a written notice of withdrawal with the district board on or before such date fixed by such board between a date 10 days after the official notice of the election on the contract between the United States and the district and the date of such election. The date limiting the time of such filing shall be announced in the official notice of the proposed election, and lands for which such notice is filed shall be deemed excluded from the district for all purposes as of the time of such filing. Thereafter lands so withdrawn and excluded so long as they remain in private ownership shall not be entitled to receive water from, through, or by means of the project works.

"(f) Any instrument, action, determination, rule, or regulation of the Secretary or his duly authorized representatives under the authority of this section 2 which is or may be determinative of the title to lands or interest in lands in private ownership within the project shall be effective as to any given parcel of land, as against purchasers for value without actual notice, only from the time of the filing for record in the office of the county auditor of the county or counties in which the lands affected are located of a copy thereof authenticated in the manner authorized by law. Such filing shall impart legal notice to the public of the matters and things set out therein.

"SEC. 3. (a) Fraudulent misrepresentation as to the true consideration involved in the conveyance of, or contract to convey, any freehold estate in land covered by a recordable contract made under subsection 2 (c) hereof, in the affidavit required by that subsection shall constitute a misdemeanor punishable by a fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment not exceeding 6 months, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

"(b) Should any freehold estate in lands subject to the recordable contract made under subsection 2 (c) hereof be conveyed or contracted to be conveyed, after the date of execution of such recordable contract and within 5 years from the time water becomes available for such lands, at a consideration in excess of the appraised value of said estate, the transaction, and any mortgage or other lien covering any deferred consideration thereunder, shall be invalid and unenforceable by the vendor or grantor, his successors or assigns as to that part of the consideration in excess of the appraised value of the estate involved. In the case of any such transaction involving deferred payments, said invalid portion of the consideration shall be deducted first from the deferred payments in the inverse order of their due dates.

"The vendee or grantee in any such transaction, at any time within 2 years from the date of any such conveyance or contract and on filing a correct affidavit as required in subdivision 2 (c) (ii), may recover from the vendor or grantor, or the successors or assigns thereof, an amount equal to the payments made in excess of the appraised value.

"In connection with any judgment or decree hereunder in favor of a vendee or grantee, said vendee or grantee shall have the right to recover court costs and reasonable attorneys' fees.

"SEC. 4. (a) For the purposes of assisting in the permanent settlement of farm families, protecting project land, facilitating project development, preventing speculation in project lands, and providing for the general welfare, the Secretary is authorized to administer public lands of the United States in the project area and lands acquired under this section; to sell, exchange, or lease such lands; to improve such lands, or other lands within the project under contract with the owners or organizations thereof as herein provided, by clearing, leveling, and preparing them for handling of irrigation water; to establish town sites on such lands; to dedicate portions of such lands for public purposes in keeping with sound project development; to acquire in the name of the United States, at prices satisfactory to him, such lands or interest in lands, within or adjacent to the project area, as he deems appropriate for the protection, development, or improvement of the project; to accept donations of real and personal property for the purposes of this act; and to disseminate information by appropriate means and methods. Any moneys realized on account of donations for purposes of this act shall be covered into the Treasury as trust funds.

"(b) Contracts, exchanges, and leases made under this section, shall be on terms that, in the Secretary's judgment, are in keeping with sound project development. In addition, land-sale contracts shall be on a basis that, in the Secretary's judgment, provides for the return in a reasonable period of years of not less than the appraised value of the land and improvements thereon. Contracts for repayment of costs incurred by the United States in clearing, leveling, and preparing lands for the handling of irrigation water may, in the Secretary's discretion, be made with individual water users or any form of water users' organization satisfactory to him.

"Qualifications of applicants for the purchase of land for irrigation farming shall be prescribed as provided in subsection C of section 4 of the act of December 5, 1924 (43 Stat. 702), notwithstanding any other provisions of law.

"SEC. 5. (a) The Secretary may enter into agreements to pay annual sums in lieu of taxes to any State or political subdivision thereof with respect to any real property situated therein after it is acquired pursuant to the authority of this act and before execution by the United States of a contract of sale covering it, out of funds derived from the leasing of such lands. The amount so paid for any year upon any such property shall not exceed the taxes that would be paid to the State or subdivision as the case may be upon such property if it were not exempt from taxation thereby.

"(b) Any public lands within the project and any lands or interests in lands acquired by the United States under this act, beginning at such date or dates and subject to such provisions and limitations as may be fixed or provided by regulations made under section 8, shall be (i) subject to the provisions of the laws of the State of Washington relating to the organization, government, and regulation of irrigation, reclamation, and conservancy districts, and (ii) subject to legal assessment or taxation by any such district, and to liens for such assessments and taxes and to all proceedings for the enforcement thereof, in the same manner and to the same extent as privately owned lands of like character. The United States does not assume any obligation for amounts so assessed or taxed; and any proceedings to enforce them shall be subject to any title then remaining in the United States, to any prior lien reserved to the United States for unpaid installments under land sale contracts made under this act, and to any lien for any other charges, accrued or unaccrued, under and by virtue of such contracts or any contract between the United States and the district in which the land is located. Regulations to carry out this subsection shall be effective when filed for record in the manner provided in subsection 2 (f).

"(c) In addition to taxation or assessment under subsection 5 (b) upon execution by the United States of a contract of sale of any lands within the project, the lands under contract may be taxed by the State or political subdivision thereof in the same manner and to the same extent as privately owned lands of a like character. All taxes legally so assessed may be enforced in the same manner and under the same proceeding whereby said taxes are enforced against privately owned lands, subject to the limitations in favor of the United States that govern the enforcement of district assessments or taxes as provided in subsection 5 (b). If lands under any such contract shall at any time revert to the United States before transfer of title under the contract by reason of default thereunder, all liens or tax titles resulting from taxes levied pursuant to the authority of this subsection upon such lands shall be thereupon extinguished; and the levying of any such tax by such State or political subdivision shall be deemed to be an agreement on its part, in the event of such reversion, to execute and record a formal release of such lien or tax title.

"SEC. 6. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such moneys as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act, to be reimbursable to the extent required by this act. All revenues received in carrying out the provisions of section 4 hereof shall be covered into the General Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. Amounts equal to appropriated funds requisitioned by the Secretary and made available for disbursement on the books of the Treasurer of the United States shall be debited in a special account in the Treasury, to be known as the Columbia Basin Land Development Account. Amounts equal to revenues covered into the General Treasury as miscellaneous receipts shall be credited in said special account. After such credits equal the amount of the debits with interest thereon at the rate of 3 percent per annum from the respective dates of the debits, additional credits in said special account shall be made by the Secretary, in the manner determined by him, the basis of corresponding credits to the construction-cost obligations of the district or districts entering into contracts under section 2 hereof.

"SEC. 7. No water shall be delivered for irrigation within the project until the State of Washington, by appropriate legislation, shall have adopted, authorized, ratified, and consented to all the provisions of this act insofar as such provisions or any of them, in whole or in part, may come within the scope of State jurisdiction or authority or be applicable to State lands.

"Legislation otherwise conforming to the standards above stated in this section will meet the requirements of the section even though, by reason of limitations in the State constitution, the contracts required under subsection 2 (c) cannot be executed pursuant to such legislation as to the State's school and other public lands. As to such lands, the provisions and requirements of subsection 2 (c) shall remain effective, but if these constitutional limitations have not been removed at least 6 months prior to the expiration of the time provided for the execution of the contracts the time is hereby extended for a period ending 6 months after the removal of the limitations.

"SEC. 8. The Secretary is authorized to perform such acts, to make such rules and regulations, and to include in the contracts hereinbefore provided for such provisions as he deems proper for carrying out the provisions of this act; and in connection with sales or exchanges under the act, he is authorized to effect conveyances without regard to the law governing the patenting of public lands. Wherever in this act functions, powers, or duties are conferred upon the Secretary, said functions, powers, or duties may be performed, exercised, or discharged by his duly authorized representatives.

"SEC. 9. The consent of the United States is hereby given to the sale of school lands and any other public lands of the State of Washington comprising a part of the lands within the project at prices not to exceed their appraised values, determined as provided in subsection 2 (a) hereof.

"SEC. 10. If any provision of this act or the application of such provision to any person or circumstances shall be held invalid, the remainder of the act and the application of such provision to persons or circumstances other than those as to which it is held invalid shall not be affected thereby.

"SEC. 11. This act may be cited as 'The Columbia Basin Project Act'."

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. WHITE. Am I to understand that the language which the Senator is proposing as an amendment to the House bill is the precise language heretofore approved by the Senate?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It is the identical language approved by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the engrossment of the amendment and the third reading of the bill.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill (H. R. 839) was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. O'MAHONEY subsequently said: Mr. President, a few moments ago the Senate passed House bill 839, having amended the bill. I move that the Senate insist on its amendment, ask for a conference with the House thereon, and that the Chair appoint conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Office appointed Mr. MCCARRAN, Mr. O'MAHONEY, Mr. CHAVEZ, Mr. MCNARY, and Mr. GURNEY conferees on the part of the Senate.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 82, to provide urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 82) to provide urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1943, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations, with amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will proceed to state the amendments of the committee.

The first amendment was, on page 1, after line 7 and following the heading "Legislative," to insert the following:

SENATE

For expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate, including compensation to stenographers of committees, at such rate as may be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, fiscal year 1943, $200,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for per diem and subsistence expenses except in accordance with the provisions of the Subsistence Expense Act of 1926, approved June 3, 1926, as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 24, to insert:

INDEPENDENT EXECUTIVE AGENCIES

THOMAS JEFFERSON BICENTENNIAL COMMISSION

For carrying out the provisions of the act entitled "An act to enable the United States Commission for the Celebration of the Two-hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of Thomas Jefferson to carry out and give effect to certain approved plans," approved July 30, 1942, fiscal year 1943, $50,000, to remain available until expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 13, to strike out "$1,000,000", and insert "$750,000."

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the amendment. If there is one bureau of the Federal Government that does not of its own initiative create work for itself it is the office of the Treasurer of the United States. The evidence which was taken by the Appropriations Committee does not present a single fact upon which the proposed reduction can be justified. On the contrary, it presents ample evidence to justify the conviction, which I entertain, that the Treasurer of the United States is not asking for enough money to do the work which should be done. The Treasurer has to examine every check which is issued by every branch of the Government. He or his office has to examine every check which is issued by the War Department, every check issued by the Navy Department, every check issued by every bureau and section of the vast establishment which has been erected here. More important than that—to me, at least—is the fact that it is necessary for the Treasurer of the United States to examine the checks which are sent as allotments to the dependents of the boys in the Army and in the Navy who are bearing the burden of the war. Yet, although the evidence before the committee was that there already is a backlog of checks which have not been examined, the committee has recommended a cut of $250,000. The Treasurer of the United States examines the checks in a more detailed and more careful way than most banks examine the checks which are passed through them.

Senators will be interested to know that more than 300 stop-payment checks pass through that office every single day of the year. The personnel of the Treasurer's office has been increased by scarcely more than 20 percent in the past 2 years, whereas the work of that office has been more than doubled.

I have here a letter which I received from the Treasury Department in response to a request which I made, and before the Senate votes, without evidence, to cut the appropriation for the office which scrutinizes the payments which are being made, I think it should know what is in this letter.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator made the statement that there is no evidence in the record upon which anyone can base an opinion as to why this reduction should be made. I am curious to know why it was made and how it came about, if the Senator will tell us that.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The reduction was made upon the motion of the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. HOLMAN], who, if I may quote him with propriety, said in the meeting of the committee that he was offering the amendment on general principles.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. If the Senator from Oregon will wait for a moment, I will yield to him.

Mr. LUCAS. What the Senator from Wyoming suggests is a very interesting way to legislate, and I am very thankful to the Senator. I should like to find out why the appropriation was cut, if there was no evidence to show any reason for it. The Senator from Illinois is just as anxious as is any other Member of the Senate to save the taxpayers' money, but I am curious to know just why it all came about. In view of the information furnished by the Senator in the first part of his statement, I have my curiosity satisfied, and I thank him.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. MCKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming has the floor. Does he yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield first to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. President, I gave also as my reason for offering the amendment which reduced by 25 percent the House emergency appropriation for the office of the Treasurer of the United States the fact that no demonstration had been made of the efficiency of the force of the Department.

In other words, although the work of the Department has increased, it is taken for granted by the proponents of this $1,000,000 deficiency appropriation that those already in the Department are efficient and industrious. I question the efficiency and industry of many persons among the hordes of payrollees in the bureaus and departments of the executive branch of our Government. All through our discussions in the Appropriations Committee, when considering the needs of the departments, we are confronted constantly with overstaffed and overmanned executive departments. The only way I know how to reduce the number of clerks and the expense incident to their employment is to cut the appropriations for them.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not cut the appropriation at the expense of the dependents of the soldiers and sailors of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. No, and probably not at the expense of efficiency in handling the business in question. There are so many employees in that office now that they are falling all over themselves. Moreover, the farming industry and commercial enterprises are being deprived of needed workers. Why cannot the executive departments get along with fewer employees; why cannot they tighten up their belts and get to work as the taxpayers and the producers of the country are doing and must continue to do to even greater extent than they yet have done, if we are to win this war. Fewer and fewer people must do more and more work in government as well as in private life.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, now will the Senator from Wyoming yield to me?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to refer, first, to the evidence, and I shall read from it——

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I was about to do it myself, but shall be very glad to have the Senator save my voice.

Mr. McKELLAR. The evidence is as follows:

We estimate that we would actually need to clear all checks—

That is merely the clerical work of clearing checks, not affecting payments to soldiers or anyone else—

We estimate that we would actually really need to clear all checks, which we now have on hand—

Listen to this:

and which will be received during the remainder of the fiscal year, $1,500,000; but we foresee—

Listen to this:

we foresee that we cannot get the necessary employees to do that much of a job.

So the witness, Mr. Barnes, assistant to the Treasurer, was asking for $1,500,000 and at the same time conceding that even if he should get it or if he should get a million dollars it was doubtful whether he could hire the employees to do the job.

So, in spite of the fact that we may get this $1,000,000, we will still have a heavy background of uncleared checks at the end of this fiscal year.

We have now on our rolls enough people so that we can use an increase of $912,000, and the only addition to our present commitment will be $81,000 for employees that we contemplate we will be able to get during the balance of the year.

That is the testimony of the Department, and on that testimony the committee was exceedingly liberal in this matter. I wish, however, to be absolutely fair and just to the Department. I now read a letter which I have received today. The Department evidently recognized that the testimony which was adduced before the committee did not even justify the $750,000 we provided for them. So I have a letter today from Mr. D. W. Bell, Acting Secretary of the Treasury, which I think ought to be read. It might have changed the situation entirely if it had been received before today but it has been received in the last half hour. I read from the letter:

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Reference is made to House Joint Resolution 82, providing urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year 1943.

As passed by the House, House Joint Resolution 82 provided a deficiency appropriation in the amount of $1,000,000 for "Salaries, Office of the Treasurer of the United States," fiscal year 1943. In reporting the resolution, the Senate Committee on Appropriations reduced this item from $1,000,000 to $750,000, with the explanation that it was the feeling of the committee that the latter amount would be sufficient for the remainder of the fiscal year.

The Department, through its representative, testified before the committee that even if it got a million dollars it did not believe it could obtain the clerical help with which to do the work, and it would still have a tremendous backlog of these checks. What was the committee to do on the evidence before it? It takes evidence to justify appropriations. On the evidence before it the committee was extremely liberal in granting $750,000.

But Mr. Bell goes on to say:

This reduction of $250,000 will have the effect of seriously impairing the accounting operaticns of the Treasury—

That is absolutely ex parte; the committee has to have facts on which to work and not mere statements—and of hampering the settlement of disbursing officers' accounts in the War and Navy Departments. I should like to take this opportunity, therefore, of placing the facts before you, with the earnest request that every effort be made to have this appropriation restored to $1,000,000, as approved by the House of Representatives.

The funds in question are required for the office of the Treasurer of the United States for the purpose of clearing the great volume of checks issued by all of the Government departments and agencies and drawn on the Treasurer. It is estimated that over 159,000,000 checks will be paid by the Treasurer of the United States during the current fiscal year. The funds made available to the Treasurer under the regular appropriations will provide for the clearance of only 69,800,000 checks. In other words, there will be 89,300,000 more checks to be handled this year than can be cleared with the funds available.

This great volume of check clearances is due to enormous increases in the number of checks issued on account of War and Navy disbursements.

In order to dispose of this vast volume of checks, it was originally estimated that a deficiency appropriation of at least $1,235,000 would be required for this fiscal year. This estimate was submitted to the Bureau of the Budget, and the justification for that amount was not questioned. However, because of the difficulty of recruiting such a large force, it was agreed by both the Bureau of the Budget and the Treasury that a smaller estimate * * *.

It is not to remove this amount, but to lessen it, that they have agreed that they cannot get that much help. The letter continues:

In his testimony before the Senate Subcommittee on Appropriations, the Assistant to the Treasurer clearly indicated that the estimate of $1,000,000 was considerably less than the amount actually needed. The Senate committee's reduction from $1,000,000 to $750,000 will, as previously stated, create a backlog of uncleared checks that will result in serious delay in the settlement of the War and Navy disbursing accounts—

Not payments to soldiers, but for the settlement of disbursing accounts—and generally affect the Treasury's accounting operations.

It should also be pointed out that the major portion of the additional employees required for this work have already been placed on the rolls.

They do not wait for the Congress, they do not care anything about putting the evidence before us when we send for them and ask them to do it.

As of this date, the Treasurer advises me that his office has on hand over 40,000,000 checks awaiting assorting, classifying, and stating. Unless the full amount of $1,000,000 is provided, the accumulation of such checks will total over 60,000,000 by July 1.

The Treasury is deeply concerned over the reduction of this appropriation, and if you should desire additional information regarding the clearance of these checks, the Department will be pleased to have its representatives appear again before your subcommittee.

Mr. President, this bill has been before the Senate since last Monday. I suggested to the Senator from Wyoming a few moments ago—I do not believe I mentioned the fact that Mr. Bell had written me a letter—that on the strength of information I had received we should let this matter go to conference, and let it be worked out there on the facts.

The Department did not furnish evidence on the subject. They admit that they did not furnish it. The committee acted absolutely in accordance with the facts, and it was because of lack of evidence that this particular appropriation was reduced.

If there is one thing the Committee on Appropriations does it is to act upon facts brought before it, and in this state of the record I think they were exceedingly liberal in allowing $750,000.

I ask that the letter from Mr. Bell be printed in full in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 24, 1943.

Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR,
Acting Chairman, Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Reference is made to House Joint Resolution 82, providing urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year 1943.

As passed by the House, House Joint Resolution 82 provided a deficiency appropriation in the amount of $1,000,000 for salaries, Office of the Treasurer of the United States, fiscal year 1943. In reporting the resolution, the Senate Committee on Appropriations reduced this item from $1,000,000 to $750,000, with the explanation that it was the feeling of the committee that the latter amount would be sufficient for the remainder of the fiscal year.

This reduction of $250,000 will have the effect of seriously impairing the accounting operations of the Treasury, and of hampering the settlement of disbursing officers' accounts in the War and Navy Departments. I should like to take this opportunity, therefore, of placing the facts before you, with the earnest request that every effort be made to have this appropriation restored to $1,000,000, as approved by the House of Representatives.

The funds in question are required by the Office of the Treasurer of the United States for the purpose of clearing the great volume of checks issued by all of the Government departments and agencies and drawn on the Treasurer. It is estimated that over 159,000,000 checks will be paid by the Treasurer of the United States during the current fiscal year. The funds made available in the Treasurer's regular appropriation will provide for the clearance of only 69,800,000 checks. In other words, there will be 89,300,000 more checks to be handled this year than can be cleared with the funds available. This great volume of check clearances is due to enormous increases in the number of checks issued on account of War and Navy disbursements.

In order to dispose of this vast volume of checks, it was originally estimated that a deficiency appropriation of at least $1,235,000 would be required for this fiscal year. This estimate was submitted to the Bureau of the Budget, and the justification for that amount was not questioned. However, because of the difficulty of recruiting such a large force, it was agreed by both the Bureau of the Budget and the Treasury that a smaller estimate in the amount of $1,000,000 would be submitted, although this amount would not provide the full number of employees actually required. In his testimony before the Senate Subcommittee on Appropriations, the Assistant to the Treasurer clearly indicated that the estimate of $1,000,000 was considerably less than the amount actually needed. The Senate committee's reduction from $1,000,000 to $750,000 will, as previously stated, create a backlog of uncleared checks that will result in serious delay in the settlement of the War and Navy disbursing accounts, and generally affect the Treasury's accounting operations.

It should also be pointed out that the major portion of the additional employees required for this work have already been placed on the rolls. In fact, on the basis of the present pay-roll commitment, a deficiency appropriation of at least $919,000 would be required in order to carry the present force to the end of the fiscal year. As of this date, the Treasurer advises me that his office has on hand over 40,000,000 checks awaiting assorting, classifying, and stating. Unless the full amount of $1,000,000 is provided, the accumulation of such checks will total over 60,000,000 by July 1.

The Treasury is deeply concerned over the reduction of this appropriation, and if you should desire additional information regarding the clearance of these checks, the Department will be pleased to have its representatives appear again before your subcommittee.

In conclusion, may I express the hope that you will do everything possible to effect the restoration of this item to the amount of $1,000,000 as approved by the House of Representatives.

Verty truly yours,

D. W. BELL,
Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I am grateful to the Senator from Tennessee for having read the letter from the Treasury Department.

I now call attention to the fact that, as I understand the testimony before the committee which the Senator has just read, and as I understand the letter, it is quite clear that the Treasurer of the United States says, "We have so much work that we should have a million and a half dollars, but since we cannot get employees in sufficient number to use that amount, we are not asking for what we should have, we are asking for a smaller amount," and the Bureau of the Budget approved the smaller amount because of a recognition of the manpower difficulty.

Now let us see exactly what transpired before the committee. I read from the report of the hearings:

Senator McKELLAR. We have a request here for an additional amount for salaries in the office of the Treasurer of the United States for the fiscal year 1943, $1,000,000.

Will you tell the committee what that is for?

Mr. Barnes, who was appearing for the Treasury, answered:

Mr. BARNES. Senator, I would like first to explain in a general way what it is for.

The Treasurer clears all of the checks issued by all of the Government departments drawn on the Treasurer of the United States. They have increased in great volume during the last year or so and our appropriation for 1943 is inadequate.

We estimate that we would actually need to clear all checks, which we now have on hand and which will be received during the remainder of the fiscal year, $1,500,000; but we foresee that we cannot get the necessary employees to do that much of a job. So, in spite of the fact that we may get this $1,000,000, we will still have a heavy backlog of uncleared checks at the end of this fiscal year.

We have now on our rolls enough people so that we can use an increase of $912,000 and the only addition to our present commitment will be $81,000 for employees that we contemplate we will be able to get during the balance of the year.

Senator McKELLAR. This is all brought about by the tremendous increase of checks drawn on the Treasury?

Mr. BARNES. The tremendous increase of checks; yes, that is the major portion of it.

Senator McKELLAR. Are there any further questions?

Senator HOLMAN. I suppose some place there is a schedule of the different kinds of employees and the number in each schedule, and what the rate of pay is for each classification; is there not? Would that be too voluminous for you to submit for the record?

Mr. BARNES. No.

Senator HOLMAN. I merely want a skeleton, an outline, just to give us an understanding of it.

Mr. BARNES. I think we have a break-down on that.

Mr. FUNK. It is in the justifications, pages 3, 4, and 5.

Senator HOLMAN. Have I been supplied with that?

Mr. FUNK. We will be glad to supply that information.

Senator McKELLAR. Will you put that into the record?

Mr. FUNK. Yes.

(The material referred to is as follows:)

I shall not read that. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator from Wyoming will permit, I think it would be very enlightening if the Senator would read it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall be glad to read it. I continue reading from the report of the hearing.

Mr. BARNES. We will put in the record a statement showing a break-down of these employees. Most of them are in the low grades. That is what we need mostly, the low-grade personnel.

Senator McKELLAR. Are there any further questions? If not, we are much obliged to you gentlemen.

(Thereupon, the subcommittee proceeded to the consideration of other business, after which it adjourned.)

That is the record, Mr. President, and the response which I received to my inquiry at the Treasury Department shows that this increase of work incident to clearing these checks has been so great that the Treasurer has been obliged to put people on the roll. They are now on the roll. They have been paid, and there will be a deficit of $7,000 as of the 1st of March. If we make the reduction of $250,000, the result will be that it will be necessary for the Treasurer to lay off some of the employees there now, and that will result in increasing the work which is now being performed.

Mr. President, from the statement of Mr. Barnes I find that the total funds appropriated for the fiscal year 1943 amounted to $1,700,000. Of this there was expended up to February 10, $1,555,000. The funds which have been committed through to the end of February amount to $152,000, making a total expended and committed of $1,707,000 by the 1st of March, or an excess of $7,000.

That was the reason, Mr. President, why the Treasury called upon the Congress for a deficiency appropriation. That call was made with the approval of the Bureau of the Budget very early in the session.

Commitment 4-month period March 1 through June 30 on present monthly base of $228,000—$912,000.

Funds requested to permit further recruitment—$81,000.

Total additional funds requested—$1,000,000.

Mr. President, I shall not labor this matter. I ask unanimous consent that the letter from the Treasury Department to me, setting forth the facts which I have tried to summarize, may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
FISCAL SERVICE,
Washington, February 25, 1943.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I appreciate your having called me in regard to the deficiency of $1,000,000 for the Office of the Treasurer of the United States for the fiscal year 1943, contained in House Joint Resolution No. 82, and which amount was reduced by the Senate committee to $750,000.

I will state in this connection that a letter was addressed to Hon KENNETH McKELLAR, acting chairman, Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate, by Mr. D. W. Bell, Acting Secretary of the Treasury, under date of February 24, explaining the need for this full appropriation of $1,000,000 and the effect of the reduction of the $250,000 on the work of the Treasurer's Office.

When the deficiency estimate was prepared and submitted to the Budget Bureau, it was estimated that in order to accomplish the clearance of all of the checks at that time estimated to be presented to the Treasurer for payment was indicated to be approximately $1,250,000. In discussing the estimate with the Budget Bureau, it was agreed between the Budget Bureau and the Treasurer's Office, however, that in view of the present situation regarding recruitment of new employees there was little possibility of being able to obtain enough employees to expend the $1,250,000 appropriation. Accordingly, the Budget Bureau reduced the estimate to $1,000,000. The basis of the estimate submitted was an increase of 59,460,000 checks over the number cleared in 1942, classified as follows:

|---|---|
| War (on basis of 3,000,000 checks monthly for 8 months) | 24,000,000 |
| Navy (on basis of 1,250,000 checks monthly for 8 months) | 10,000,000 |
| Less 1942 clearings | 2,500,000 |
| Navy yards (on basis of 17,000,000 less 3,200,000 cleared in 1942) | 13,800,000 |
| Interest | 950,000 |
| Social Security Board | 2,150,000 |
| Public debt redemption (based on 18,000,000 bonds) | 1,060,000 |
| Other war activities and war establishments | 10,000,000 |
| Total | 59,460,000 |

This increase applied to the checks cleared in 1942, amounting to 79,124,903, would make a total of 138,584,903 checks to be cleared by the Treasurer in 1943. The regular appropriation for the Treasurer's Office for 1943 provided for the clearance of 69,800,000 checks. Assuming 138,584,903 checks for 1943, however, the estimate was short by 68,784,903 checks.

The item of 10,000,000 checks in the above tabulation, shown under "other war activities and war establishments," is now estimated, however, to amount to 42,700,000. So, it is clear that the figures used for the deficiency estimate were far below the number of checks that are now expected to be presented. The major portion of the $1,000,000 requested, $890,800, is for the clearance of checks, excluding $42,700 for rental and purchase of equipment used in connection therewith. The $109,200 was for additional work in other activities of the Treasurer's office in connection with the administrative work in regard to personnel, accounting, and the redemption of securities.

The situation, as it appears at this time, is substantially as follows:

Salaries, office of the Treasurer, United States

|---|---|
| Total funds appropriated for fiscal year 1943 | $1,700,000 |
| Expended through Feb. 10, 1943 | 1,555,000 |
| Funds committed through end of February 1943 | 152,000 |
| | 1,707,000 |
| Indicated deficiency as of Mar. 1, 1943 | 7,000 |
| Commitment 4-month period Mar. 1 through June 30 on present monthly base of $228,000 | 912,000 |
| Funds requested to permit further recruitment | 81,000 |
| Total additional funds requested | 1,000,000 |

It will be noted from this statement that there is an indicated deficiency of $7,000 as of March 1. The personnel commitment for employees now on the roll for the 4-month period March 1 through June 30 is $912,000. The $81,000 shown in the statement above is for personnel recruitment during the current fiscal year. It will be noted that in order to cover the deficiency as of March 1 and provide for the present employees, $919,000 would be required. The appropriation of $750,000, therefore, would be $169,000 short of the amount needed to carry our present employees until June 30 and would not permit of the further recruitment notwithstanding the great volume of work to be accomplished. It would mean in effect that curtailment of the force would have to be accomplished to offset the shortage of $169,000. It is thought that such curtailment would be decidedly inadvisable at this time in view of the fact that we have use for all of the employees on the roll and all that we can recruit for the balance of the fiscal year and that, notwithstanding any recruitments we may be able to accomplish, we will have a tremendous backlog of checks at the end of the fiscal year.

In other words there will be approximately 89,300,000 more checks presented this year than we will be able to handle without funds available. With the funds of the additional appropriation, we would still have a backlog of fifty-five to sixty million checks by June 30.

The break-down of personnel for this increase is included in my testimony before the Senate committee, and for your information I am supplying it herewith as follows:

Additional personnel on an average annual basis necessary to meet increased requirements of Office of Treasurer of United States, fiscal year 1943

Very truly yours,

G. O. BARNES,
Assistant to the Treasurer.

HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I rose for the purpose of making clear on the Senate floor, as I did in committee, why I feel the action proposed to be taken would be a great mistake; it would be legislation upon a basis, it seems to me, not to be altogether justified, and it would certainly cut down the work of a bureau of the Government which is not responsible for the increased burden placed upon it. The huge appropriations which we are making for war materials, the appropriations we are making for airplanes, for guns and tanks, the appropriations we are making for allotments, the appropriations for this tremendous increase of expenditure, all have to clear through the office in question, and the number of checks clearing through it are twice as many today as they were a year ago. The facts clearly indicate that although the work of this office has been considerably more than doubled, the personnel has been increased by only 20 percent. Mr. President, I feel that the proposed action is a striking example of false economy.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, it is remarkable how these organizations grow. It will be seen from the reading of this additional personnel set-up that it is made on a yearly basis. The Department officials are figuring this million dollars on a yearly basis. They are not figuring on the basis of the next 4½ months' period. Listen to this from the justification placed in the hearings. I hope the Senate will listen to it, because our committee has been attacked. It has been suggested that we were reporting bills without having the facts before us. I deny that as strongly as it is possible to deny it, because it is not correct.

Senators, listen:

Additional personnel on an average annual basis.

This is not a 4 months' basis. This is a deficiency bill we are passing, providing for the remainder of the fiscal year ending June 30.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. In order that there may be no misunderstanding about the matter, the $750,000 which is in the joint resolution at the present time for the purposes outlined is a deficiency appropriation to carry out the functions of this particular agency to the 30th of next June only.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is correct.

Mr. TYDINGS. In the meantime the Senate will be considering the regular appropriation bill, which will make the appropriation for the year which begins the 1st of July next and ends a year from then.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, we will.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield in a moment. I wish to say to the Senate that it is very difficult to deal with bureaucracies. I hope my friend, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS], will not be too hard on us. I hope he will not berate us too greatly. Our committee is trying to do its duty.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Illinois was not berating the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Illinois interrupted the Senator from Wyoming and asked if this bill had been reported without testimony having been taken; if the committee made these reductions without having any testimony before it. I deny that that was done. I hope to heaven the Senate will uphold me in that denial, because I have the facts here which were put into the record after the meeting of the committee.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr LUCAS. I never want to be misunderstood by my good friend the Senator from Tennessee. I was not berating the committee, but I merely asked the Senator from Wyoming, in view of the information he furnished the Senate, upon what basis the committee reported the measure, or cut this appropriation, if what the Senator said was correct, that there was no evidence to sustain it. I asked the Senator how it came about, and he told the story. That is all the Senator from Illinois was seeking. My curiosity was satisfied.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am delighted to know that.

Mr. LUCAS. If I berated the committee, or if the Senator thought what I said in any way implied a berating of him as chairman, I want to apologize.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I do not want the Senator from Illinois to apologize.

Mr. LUCAS. I do not want to get into any argument at all with my friend, the Senator from Tennessee, because he is a pretty touchy fellow to handle, and I want to be just as kind to him as I can be.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sorry the Senator from Illinois thinks I am tough because I am not.

Let me go back to what the Treasury Department has put in the record:

> Additional personnel on an average annual basis.

Do Senators know what that means? That means that all these clerks will be on the list of employees when the agency comes in under the regular appropriation bill. The employees now proposed to be provided for will be there then. When they are there they are glued there. They cannot be separated from their places there.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator, I am sure, will recognize the fact that the statement which is made with respect to the payment on an annual basis does not mean that the agency is asking for an appropriation for a year.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know what they are asking for. The evidence does not disclose.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It is very clear.

Mr. McKELLAR. Wait a moment. I wish to say, in answer to the Senator's question, that whatever the intention may be, the Department asked for 635 clerks on an annual basis of $1,000,000, and the officials are so accurate about it they do not even divide the clerks into parts, as they do sometimes in the set-up. They have the exact number that will take the exact amount of $1,000,000. That is what they intend to do. Simply because some checks have not been sorted as they want them sorted they want the $1,000,000 in order to take on a set of employees who will be there probably as long as they live, or as long as the Government lasts.

Senators, listen to this: The Department asks for 325 clerks at $1,440, or a total amount of $468,000. That is for the year. According to their own figures, this appropriation instead of providing $1,000,000 for a deficiency should provide much less. The Department officials say they cannot get that many clerks.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Has not the Senator always found that the average departmental head, or bureau or agency head, who comes before the Committee on Appropriations, or a subcommittee thereof, never recommends a cut in an appropriation? In his long experience, has the Senator from Tennessee ever known of a department head recommending a cut in an appropriation?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator's question reminds me of a breakfast I had with President Hoover in 1931, when we were trying to effect reductions, just as we are trying to effect them now. Mr. Mills was Secretary of the Treasury. He was one of the most delightful gentlemen I have ever known, and he was also a very efficient man. He was sitting across the table from me, and when the question of economy was brought up the President asked for expressions of opinion. I said:

> Mr. President, the first thing to do, it seems to me, is to convert members of your Cabinet.

I said:

> Take my good friend, Mr. Mills, who sits right across the table from me. Yesterday he was before the committee testifying that his Department could not do the work required of it unless appropriations were increased; and every other member of the Cabinet has been before our committee asking that their appropriations be increased.

Mr. President, answering specifically the question asked by the Senator from New Mexico, I do not believe I recall when a department head requested that a cut be made in an appropriation.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President will the Senator yield further?

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall yield in a moment. I wish to say that heaven knows we want to give the office in question whatever is necessary, and when there is evidence supporting their request I should be delighted to give them what they ask. This is a time of stress, but I want to see the work of the Government proceed in a proper way. That is why I urged upon my friend the Senator from Wyoming, awhile ago, that instead of taking the course he proposed, we take the course of letting the matter go to conference, calling the officials before us, and making them tell us exactly what they mean, and let the matter be settled. If it goes to conference we shall have these men before the conference committee, and they will be given whatever is right within the terms of the House bill and the Senate amendment.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I wish to thank the Senator from Tennessee for allowing me to make a further observation. Personally I believe it is time that some Senator should take the action which was taken by the Senator from Oregon. I have been a member of the Committee on Appropriations for several years. I have always found that the heads of bureaus or divisions come before the committee and in a plausible way conclusively prove to the committee, to their own satisfaction, that it should give them every penny which they ask for; but we have never heard of anyone appearing on behalf of the taxpayer and telling the committee that the money should not be appropriated.

Mr. McKELLAR. In the present state of the record it seems to me that this belated proposal for an appropriation of a million dollars indicates that a large number of employees are being placed on the rolls. When we come to the regular appropriation bill it will be said, "We have all these employees, and we must have appropriations for them." I want to appropriate every dollar that is necessary to do the work. At first the Department demanded $1,500,000 and at the same time it asserted that it did not know whether it could get the employees. This is a deficiency appropriation, and not an annual appropriation. It seems to me that $750,000 should be sufficient to do all the work necessary.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. My understanding of the phrase "on an annual basis" has always been that it relates only to the rate of compensation of the employees. Congress, of course, will determine hereafter whether $1,000,000, or any other sum, should continue to be appropriated. I understand the phrase to mean that the employees will be paid on an annual basis. Dividing $1,000,000 by 650, which is the number which I believe the Senator suggested they wanted to put on, we get approximately $1,640 per annum as the average rate of pay. If an employee were on the pay roll for only 6 months, and were paid on an annual basis, he would get as much a month for 6 months as he would receive if he were employed for the whole year. That is what I understand the words "on an annual basis" to mean.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know what the phrase means, except what it says. "Annual basis" means annual basis so far as I can understand the language. However, aside from that, why should we not have the facts? An appropriation of $1,000,000 is requested. A million dollars is more than I can draw a check for. The Department ought to justify it. I am perfectly willing to have representatives of the Department come before the conference committee and justify it. We do not want to do any person an injustice. The amendment of the committee could not possibly result in injustice to any soldier or sailor, as my distinguished friend intimated a while ago might be the case.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I believe the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, as the acting chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, will readily admit that he has usually found me in his corner when he has been trying to reduce appropriations.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is correct.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Sometimes he has found me in his corner when he has tried to increase appropriations.

Mr. McKELLAR. That may be true.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. In this instance, I feel that the committee has acted under a misapprehension, and I have so stated.

In order that I may make clear what I have in mind, permit me to say that it must not be forgotten that this additional appropriation of a million dollars, which the Treasurer has asked for, is not to be expended alone on the employees who have been listed. It is to be expended for the payment of all salaries. The point is that already the work of the Treasurer has been so great that the appropriation heretofore made has been altogether exhausted and there will be a deficit of $7,000 on the 1st of March next. The amount of $1,000,000 which has been requested is for the purpose of paying all the employees, including these employees, until the 30th of next June.

With respect to the remark made a moment ago by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], let me say that the record clearly shows that the Treasurer asked for $1,500,000 in the first instance. He then saw that he probably could not obtain the employees. He then discussed with the Bureau of the Budget an appropriation on the basis of $1,250,000, and finally accepted a reduction of $500,000 under what had been originally requested. I believe that we have before us an instance of an agency which has been operating efficiently and economically. I am glad to hear the Senator state that he intends to have the matter pursued in conference.

Mr. McKELLAR. I informed the Senator to that effect before the discussion arose.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator will recall that I was on my feet presenting another matter to go to conference, and I thought the Senator was referring to that. I wish the record to be clear that so far as I can see, the reduction should not be made. If it is made, it will seriously cripple an essential work of the Treasury Department.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, under the law the appropriations for the fiscal year ought to have been broken down into 12 parts. That seems not to have been done. The appropriation for the whole year is $1,700,000, and we are now in the month of February. Four months and a few days remain, and a deficiency appropriation of $1,000,000 is requested, after practically two-thirds of the year has expired. When we allow $750,000 more, I think we are being exceedingly liberal.

The Senator from Wyoming seems to have talked with officials in the Department and apparently is in possession of some additional facts which the committee did not have. However, on the basis of the facts furnished the committee, I think we have been exceedingly liberal, and I hope the Senate will not change the pending amendment, but will agree to it. I very much hope that the Senate will agree to the amendment and allow this matter to go to conference. We do not have the facts warranting the granting of a larger sum. I think we have been exceedingly liberal upon the facts which the Department has given us, and we have asked the Department for facts.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I should like to ask the distinguished Senator from Tennessee if he has any knowledge as to how much of the original appropriation of $1,750,000 is now available?

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that it will be entirely exhausted by today or tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee on page 3, line 13.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] desires to address the Senate, but he has been called momentarily from the Chamber, and I shall occupy the time until he returns.

I very much hope that the position of the Senator from Tennessee will have the support of this body.

This is the first appropriation bill which has come before the Senate during the present session of Congress.

This is the first item about which there has been a controversy concerning the amount of money to be appropriated. This is the first effort to cut the expenses of the Government in an appropriation bill presented to this session. It seems to me that the attitude which we take on this matter will be largely determinative of the attitude of Congress toward appropriations during the life of this session. I believe we shall announce to the country by the vote which we are about to take whether we, of this Congress, are savers of the public funds or spenders of the public funds. I very much hope that word will go out to the people of the Nation that this Congress proposes to save the finances of the Nation if it can be done.

Mr. President, there has been a dearth of testimony in connection with this item. I think it is safe to say that there was no affirmative showing by the Department of the need for the sum of $1,000,000, with the exception that a Department representative said he wanted and needed the money. There was an assertion of a need, but there was no proof of the necessity for the money.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Can the Senator tell us whether any more elaborate testimony was presented in the hearings before the House committee than was presented before the Senate committee?

Mr. WHITE. No, the House hearing was as devoid of information concerning the subject as was the short hearing before the Senate. However, the fact remains that in general, when representatives of the departments come before the Appropriations Committee and ask for additional employees and additional money—in this instance 635 clerks and an additional $1,000,000—those representatives are the ones who appoint the clerks and spend the money, and in a very real sense they are self-serving witnesses.

Mr. President, I believe that the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee, that this matter be gone into further before the conference committee, should have weight. This issue having been raised and presented to us, I think we ought to declare by our votes that we propose to save the money of the people of the Nation whenever and wherever it is possible for us to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 3, line 13.

Mr. GUFFEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Aiken | Guffey | Overton |
| Austin | Gurney | Radcliffe |
| Bailey | Hawkes | Reed |
| Barkley | Hayden | Revercomb |
| Bridges | Hill | Reynolds |

| Danaher | Millikin | Walsh |
| Eastland | Moore | Wherry |
| Ellender | Murray | White |
| Ferguson | Nye | Wiley |
| Gerry | O'Mahoney | Wilson |
| Green | | |

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 3, line 13.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it so happens that I am a member of the Appropriations Committee and have had an opportunity to give the matter under consideration some thought. I have a high regard for the faithfulness of the office of the Treasurer of the United States, and I am confident that the request was made in a spirit of sincerity. Also, I dislike any false economy. False economy is just as bad as false expenditure, and it is no part of my thought to favor the taking of any step which would cripple the Government; but I think it should be borne in mind that the item under consideration is a deficiency item, that other deficiency bills will be coming along, and that if the proposed reduction is too severe—and I am inclined to think that it is not—there will be ample opportunity to make a showing on that point, and for Congress to take corrective action.

Since I have been a Member of the Senate there has been an atmosphere which gives one the feeling that certain agencies are more eager in looking for reasons why a thing cannot be done than in trying to overcome the difficulties and accomplish the task. We are in a period in which the people certainly begrudge any needless appropriations, when they are called upon to make such heavy expenditures for the immediate prosecution of the war. One of the most effective ways in which the Appropriations Committee can work to achieve economy is to try in a friendly and cooperative spirit to put some of the agencies on their mettle and to let them see what they can do with smaller amounts. After all, a great many people in our armed forces and on the home front—the heads of families, mothers, and wives who are trying to get by under rationing—are having their ingenuity tested. They are being called upon to do the best they can with the means at hand, even though those means may be inadequate; and I think we should have some of that same spirit in Government.

I have an idea that if the agency affected by the pending amendment will develop the modern, wartime approach to its duties it will be surprised when it sees how much it can do with the means at hand, even though it does not have the full amount for which it asks. As the chairman of the committee said, that agency will have an opportunity when the bill is in conference; it will have other opportunities when other urgent deficiency bills come before the Senate. So I hope the committee amendment will be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 3, line 13.

Mr. WHERRY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BARKLEY (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], who is ill. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRIDGES (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS]. Not knowing how he would vote, I transfer that pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WILLIS], and let my vote stand.

Mr. HILL. I announce that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is absent from the Senate because of illness.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the Senators from Washington [Mr. BONE and Mr. WALLGREN], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CLARK], the Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY], the Senators from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE and Mr. RUSSELL], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE], the Senator from New York [Mr. MEAD], the Senator from Utah [Mr. MURDOCK], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are detained on official business for the Senate.

The Senators from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS and Mr. PEPPER], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHANDLER], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. McCLELLAN] the Senator from Texas [Mr. O'DANIEL], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. TRUMAN] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] is detained on business in one of the Government departments.

Mr. WHITE. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] has been called away on official business. He has a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CHANDLER]. I am advised that, if present, the Senator from Pennsylvania would vote "yea."

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] are necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 56, nays 7, as follows:

So the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senate that a day or two ago I received a letter from Mr. James W. Murphy and Mr. John D. Rhodes, who, as we all know, are our Official Reporters here in the Senate. I will read the letter so that the Members of the Senate may understand exactly what they desire. The letter is addressed to me, and reads as follows:

FEBRUARY 22, 1943.

Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR,
Acting Chairman, Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR MCKELLAR: As explained to you this morning, owing to the fact that the employees of the Official Reporters of Debates of the Senate are not on the regular Senate roll, it has not been possible to pay them the 10 percent additional compensation under the terms of the act approved December 22, 1942. We therefore beg to submit for your consideration the amendment to House Joint Resolution 82 which is enclosed, which will enable us to pay the employees entitled to it the same additional compensation as is being paid to the employees of the Official Reporters of Debates of the House of Representatives and other Government employees. The amendment has been drawn and the amount will be paid in strict accordance with the provisions of the additional compensation act (Public Law 821, 77th Cong., 2d sess.). The total amount involved to April 30, 1943, is $676.17.

Very respectfully yours,

JAMES W. MURPHY,
JOHN D. RHODES,
Official Reporters, United States Senate.

The reason the suggested amendment covers the period only to April 30 is that the temporary law providing 10 percent additional compensation expires on that date, and thereafter there will probably be another law passed which will take care of the situation from that time on. For that reason these gentlemen have asked for only $676.17.

It is a matter of apparent justice. I offer the amendment, Mr. President, and ask that the clerk read it. I hope the Senate will agree to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, after line 6, it is proposed to insert the following:

To enable the Official Reporters of Debates of the Senate to pay employees of their office engaged in work connected with reporting or transcribing of official proceedings of the Senate additional compensation amounting to 10 percent of their earned basic compensation as is not in excess of the rate of $2,900 per annum, in accordance with the terms of Public Law 821, Seventy-seventh Congress, second session, approved December 22, 1942, $676.17.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, may I ask what period of time the amount provided is proposed to cover?

Mr. McKELLAR. From the date of the approval of the act, which was December 22, 1942, until April 30, 1943, when the act goes out of existence.

Mr. LODGE. And is it to be presumed that at that time the Official Reporters will be on the same basis as the other employees?

Mr. McKELLAR. They will be on the same basis as other employees; but that legislation is yet to be passed.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. In order to make the record complete, the purpose of this amendment is to put the Senate Official Reporters in the same status as the Official Reporters of the House of Representatives, so that there may be no preference in either body for the same work?

Mr. McKELLAR. None whatever. That is the purpose.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. In responding to the Senator from Massachusetts, I believe the Senator from Tennessee said that it would take effect from the date of the approval of the act on December 22. I understand, however, that the law, as originally passed, was retroactive to December 1, 1942, and therefore the amendment will conform to that provision.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Senator is correct about it. The act was approved on December 22, but, as I recall, was made retroactive to the 1st of December 1942.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass?

The joint resolution was passed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, request a conference with the House of Representatives thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. GLASS, Mr. HAYDEN, Mr. TYDINGS, Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. NYE, and Mr. LODGE conferees on the part of the Senate.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

Mr. RADCLIFFE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 677, to amend the National Housing Act, as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 677) to amend the National Housing Act, as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 677) to amend the National Housing Act, as amended, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 603 (a) of the National Housing Act, as amended, is hereby amended by (1) striking out "$800,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$1,200,000,000"; and (2) striking out of the third proviso "July 1, 1943" in each place where it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "July 1, 1944."

Mr. RADCLIFFE. Mr. President, this bill is a measure to amend the law in regard to activities of the Federal Housing Administration. It does not create any new organization nor does it give the Federal Housing Administration any new authority. It merely creates two extensions; one in the matter of time, and the other in regard to the maximum amount of mortgages which can be reinsured under the act.

Under the present law the act would expire on July 1, 1943, and the maximum amount which can be reinsured under the existing law is $800,000,000. The bill provides for extending the time limit to July 1, 1944, and also for increasing the amount of mortgages which could be insured under the act to $1,200,000,000.

The operations under the Federal Housing Act are so familiar to my colleagues in the Senate that I am sure it is not necessary to give any explanation or description of them. The operations of the Federal Housing Administration have been of very great value; in fact, I can say that they have been of vital importance in helping to create housing facilities for workers in defense areas. The demand for these housing facilities has increased so materially and so fast that it is necessary there should be new legislation extending the time, and also the maximum of insurance. The good and highly constructive service rendered under the present law should be continued.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator whether the bill applies to defense housing only.

Mr. RADCLIFFE. That is the purport of it.

Mr. LODGE. No other type of housing is contemplated under it?

Mr. RADCLIFFE. It contemplates only defense housing, under title VI of the Federal Housing Act.

Mr. LODGE. How much money is authorized to be appropriate for this purpose?

Mr. RADCLIFFE. There is no appropriation whatever provided. I can say that the Federal Housing Administration has been operating so far at a profit, and no appropriation is called for or desired. The bill merely raises the maximum amount of mortgages which can be insured under the provisions of the act, and extends the time limit for its operations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no amendments to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ATTENDANCE OF ARMY PERSONNEL AT EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, at the request of the Army, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to consider Senate bill 739, a bill relating to the attendance of Army personnel at educational institutions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 739) to amend the act entitled "An act to authorize the attendance of personnel of the Army of the United States as students in educational institutions and other places."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I have no objection to the bill; I think from what I know of it that it is a wholly meritorious measure. We have not been calling the calendar today, but Senators are reaching into it and picking out bills and asking unanimous consent for their consideration, or moving that certain measures on the calendar be made the subject of Senate consideration.

I confess I think that if the calendar is in effect to be called in the method we have been pursuing today, there should be an understanding to that effect, and Senators who are absent should know that bills are being brought from the calendar before the Senate for consideration. I repeat, I do not intend to object to the bill to which the Senator from North Carolina refers.

Mr. REYNOLDS. My only reason for bringing the matter to the attention of the Senate today is that the War Department have requested that this bill be given immediate consideration. They asked me to try to get the bill through last Monday, and a week before that the Committee on Military Affairs had considered the bill, and it had been unanimously reported.

The Army officials tell us they have made all their arrangements with colleges and universities to take an increased number of students of whom they are very badly in need in the Army, and that failure to enact such legislation is considerably hampering the war program.

The bill merely grants the privilege of raising the percentage of men in uniform who may be sent to colleges and universities. The expanded program goes into effect March 1, and they say that if this matter should be delayed any longer, it would cause much difficulty and confusion, and result in a good deal of unnecessary expenditure.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina whether or not the language in the bill which would authorize the employment of students as investigators at industrial plants is something new. Is not that outside the present law?

Mr. REYNOLDS. It is outside the present law, as I understand.

Mr. DANAHER. What is the purpose of it?

Mr. REYNOLDS. As a matter of fact, at the present time, under a law passed some time ago, the Army is privileged to send 2 percent of its officers and its inducted men in uniform and in service, after they have received their basic 13 weeks' training, to colleges and to universities, for the purpose of increasing their knowledge of certain specialties in which they happen to have been trained. The Army finds that the 2 percent will not be sufficient, with the increased personnel of the Army, and they merely ask that the 2 percent be raised in order that they may procure for themselves the technicians and the specialists whom they find absolutely necessary to carry on the war program.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Public Law No. 435, Seventy-seventh Congress, approved February 6, 1942, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"That during the present war and for 6 months thereafter and notwithstanding other provisions of existing law, personnel of all components of the Army of the United States may be detailed as students at technical, professional, and other educational institutions, or as students, observers, or investigators at industrial plants, hospitals, and other places, and all necessary expenses incident thereto shall be payable from any appropriations available to the Military Establishment: Provided, That this act shall not be construed as authorizing the acquisition of real estate by the War Department, except by lease, for use in the Army specialized training program."

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to consider executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will proceed to state the nominations on the calendar.

NATIONAL MEDIATION BOARD—WILLIAM M. LEISERSON

The legislative clerk read the nomination of William M. Leiserson to be a member of the National Mediation Board.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

NATIONAL MEDIATION BOARD—HARRY H. SCHWARTZ

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Harry H. Schwartz to be a member of the National Mediation Board.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. President, I feel it is my duty to oppose the nomination of former Senator Schwartz to the National Mediation Board. There is nothing personal in my opposition. The action I am taking is one of principle, and in considering the nomination from this angle I have to ask myself, and I ask Senators, can we have confidence that the decisions rendered by this nominee as a member of the Mediation Board will be fair, just, and in nowise influenced by the thoughts and wishes—or, shall we say, commands—of the Chief Executive, who has sent this nomination to the Senate?

To answer this question we must look into the record of this nominee for the last 6 years, during which time he was a Member of this body. He was elected to the United States Senate in 1936 on a platform of "I will support Mr. Roosevelt in everything he does and says; I will vote for every measure he wants; and I will vote against everything he does not want. I will support him blindly." He was elected on that platform in 1936, and I think every Member of the Senate will agree with me that he lived up to the very letter of that platform during the 6 years he was a Member of this body.

In his campaign for re-election last fall his platform was exactly the same as it was in 1936—"I have been a rubber stamp for the President for 6 years and I offer myself again as a rubber stamp for the ensuing 6 years."

He was defeated because he offered a continuation of his rubber-stamp services. So the "pay off"—his nomination as a member of the National Mediation Board is sent here for confirmation.

In order that he may function efficiently, it is essential that a member of the National Mediation Board shall have the proper approach, that of an unbiased interceder or propitiator, who shall be able to mediate fairly and justly. We have no right to assume that this nominee has any such qualifications. On the contrary, we have every right to assume that his sympathy and his response will be colored by the views and wishes of some other man to whom he considers he owes allegiance.

Mr. President, the sending of such a nomination to the Senate reflects no credit on the Chief Executive. There is not a soul in this country who is not ready and anxious to get behind the President, as Commander in Chief, in every effort he takes to win this war, but when we, in the Senate, have to take time out to consider political partisan appointments which are sent us for confirmation it makes us wonder how much of the whole war set-up is politically partisan.

We hear on all sides that the public esteem for the United States Senate is at an all-time low. Regardless of whether this estimate is justified or not, it would do no harm to point out that the Congress of the United States is the one hope of true democracy in the country today, and it is no exaggeration to say that it is the only representation that true democracy has in the Capital City today.

It is within the power of this body here today to perform an act of independence, to show the people of the Nation that the Senate, the greatest deliberative body in the world, is fulfilling the purpose for which it was created by refusing to confirm this nomination, this political payment for 6 years of rubber-stamp servitude to the exploded fallacies of the distorted minds of the creators of the now completely discredited New Deal.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I had not expected to say anything concerning this nomination, because I know that all Members of the Senate who for the past 6 years have served with the nominee know that he is a man of outstanding character and ability. I know that those who served with him on the various Senate committees will give that testimony.

It is true that he was a political candidate 6 years ago, and that he made a pledge to the people of his State that if he were elected he would support the President of the United States. He carried out that pledge because he believed it was the basis upon which he was elected. He carried out his pledge to the people of his State. I did not agree with the Senator on many of his votes. I frequently disagreed with him. I did not agree with him on the sort of pledge he made. I say freely and frankly that I would make no such pledge. This man did. He lived up to it. More than that, I can say that so far as the interests of the State of Wyoming are concerned, his record for 6 years can be scanned and it will be found that never once did he vote against the interests of his State or of the people of his State, and upon matters of that kind he did not hesitate to disagree with the leadership of the President. The pledge upon which he was elected was a pledge upon the larger national issues.

Now with respect to his partisanship, Mr. President, I should like to say a word. Harry Schwartz was a member of the field service of the Department of the Interior when Secretary Ballinger was under attack. A political attack was leveled against Secretary Ballinger, the Republican Secretary of the Interior under the Republican President, William Howard Taft. Mr. Schwartz, then a Democrat, supported and defended Mr. Ballinger, and he did it so effectively that long after that administration had passed into history, and when the present administration had come into power, and Secretary Ickes was at the head of the Department of the Interior, Senator Schwartz showed him why in his judgment he believed Ballinger was right, and brought Secretary Ickes to the defense of Secretary Ballinger.

I think it should be said in behalf of this former member of this body that he is not and never has been a narrow partisan; that he is a man of ability, and a man of character. I believe he is completely qualified to discharge the duties of the position to which he has been nominated, and I shall be very happy indeed to vote for the confirmation of his nomination.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. President, this is just another appointment of a "yes man." I gladly support the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON] in his opposition to the nominee for reasons similar to those he has assigned. In my opinion, the people of Wyoming, and of the country as a whole, will find encouragement in his stand.

This nomination is another instance where the people's voice is ignored. Again we are asked to confirm another ex-officeholder with the type of mind that will be controlled by the proposition that "the king can do no wrong."

This nomination is another refutation of the assertion that in the prosecution of a war partisanship is submerged in the interest of winning the war. Every branch of the Government is constituted with the character of mind which is actuated by political considerations. The rights of the States, which are deeply imbedded in the Constitution, are today totally ignored. Every governmental function is more and more being definitely packed—literally packed—with men to whom party, or regime, is the thing. Willing and able men are being excluded, and will continue to be excluded, from any participation in governmental activities during this time of crisis. The people are being admonished, and Congress is being admonished, to place no obstacles in the way of the Government in the prosecution of this war. The wisdom of Woodrow Wilson is being ignored. He said:

> We do not need less criticism in time of war, but more. It is hoped that criticism will be constructive, but better unfair attack than autocratic repression. Honesty and competence require no shield of secrecy.

The appointments which come to the Senate for confirmation are principally of a partisan, political character. In the pending case, it is just another instance of a back-door entrance into the Government in defiance of the will of the people of Wyoming.

The same principle obtains with reference to the judiciary. The rights and equities of the State of Louisiana are totally ignored in the appointment of an active politician to a high and responsible judicial position. That appointment, too, is a reward to the individual who, also, is a "yes man" to the political philosophy of the New Deal party.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I do not wish to discuss the particular qualifications of the appointee whose nomination is now under consideration. Those who have served with Mr. Schwartz have, I think, a high regard for his character, his ability, and his patriotism. I have no question as to his qualifications, both from the intellectual standpoint and from the standpoint of his general attitude upon the subject with which he will deal, in the position to which he has been nominated.

I wish to observe very briefly, however, concerning the belated "holier than thou" attitude assumed here in this session of Congress against the appointment of men who have held office heretofore, but who have been defeated for reelection, and have been named to executive positions. If I had the time to give a list of all the so-called lame ducks who in the history of the United States have been appointed to high station, I am sure that it would be found that it is not a partisan habit. Abraham Lincoln was a "lame duck" at one time. He was a defeated candidate. He was defeated not only once but more than once in some of his political aspirations, and yet I think we all will realize that he became and now is one of the outstanding historical figures in all American history. He was a "lame duck" though during his political career.

I recall that President William Howard Taft was overwhelmingly defeated for President of the United States in 1912. Of course he was not a senatorial "lame duck," he was not a congressional "lame duck," but he was a Presidential "lame duck." Yet that did not bar him from elevation to the highest station in our judicial system, the Chief Justiceship of the United States, and it did not bar him from making an outstanding Chief Justice of the United States.

In 1912 the distinguished former Senator from Utah, Mr. Sutherland, became a "lame duck." He was thereafter promptly appointed to the Supreme Court by a Republican President, and his nomination was promptly confirmed by the Senate with no serious objection or opposition. If serious weight is to be given to the theory now being advanced against the appointment of men merely because they have been defeated or repudiated by the people under circumstances which probably have no bearing whatever upon their qualifications, the people of our country will be denied the services of these outstanding men as well as many others who might be mentioned as having been at one time or another "lame ducks."

It so happens that at the present time the Democratic Party is in power and is the legitimate object of attack. There is an open season on it. I realize that. However, that has not always been true. When the Republicans were in power they did not disdain the appointment of men who had served here and elsewhere, and had been so unfortunate as to be defeated by the people when they came up for reelection.

I have mentioned only a few—the number has been legion—in order to express the hope that qualified men will not be denied the right to serve their country merely because they have been defeated in an election. If that had been the rule during the past, the country would have been deprived of the services of some of its ablest, most patriotic, and outstanding citizens.

Mr. BUSHFIELD. Mr. President, I believe that an important point was ignored entirely during the discussion which has taken place. I do not know the gentleman from Wyoming whose name has been proposed, or anything about him; but the position to which he has been nominated is semijudicial in character. Therefore, his expressions of opinion relative to what he would do under certain circumstances become very vital in arriving at the decision which Senators are asked to make. We might as well say that in selecting a jury in a court of law the members of the jury should be chosen because they have promised in advance to do what the prosecuting attorney wants them to do.

The Senator from Kentucky has mentioned the name of a former President of the United States, a very distinguished statesman. I refer to William Howard Taft. If Mr. Taft had pledged the President of the United States who appointed him that as a member of the Supreme Court of the United States he would do exactly what the President asked him to do, the Senate would not have confirmed the nomination of former President Taft to that high judicial office.

Mr. BARKLEY. I agree with the statement made by the Senator from South Dakota. However, I deny—and I defy anyone to controvert the denial—that the man whose name is under consideration promised the President what he would do in any case arising before the board to which he has been nominated as a member. In his campaign for election in the first instance, and when he ran for reelection recently, he did only what many Democrats, as well as Republicans, have done. He promised to support the President, who is a member of his own party. There is nothing reprehensible about that. I defy any Senator to point to anything that Mr. Schwartz ever said as indicating that in any decision which might come before him as a member of this board he would be governed by partisan considerations. I do not think any such evidence can be adduced.

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON] for a moment.

I was elected to the United States Senate in 1934, the first time a Democratic Senator was elected from Pennsylvania in 60 years. I had one plank in my platform, and that was 100-percent support of President Roosevelt and his New Deal policies. I carried the State by 125,000. I was reelected in 1940 by a majority of more than 175,000. I ran on the same platform—100 percent support of President Roosevelt and his policies. I was the first Democratic Senator reelected from Pennsylvania in 100 years. The last Democratic Senator to be reelected was Mr. Buchanan, who subsequently was elected President of the United States. I now predict that the President and the Democratic Party will carry Pennsylvania in 1944 on 100-percent support of the President's policies, and I wish to assure the Senators on the other side of the Chamber that I will have a Democratic colleague from Pennsylvania after that date.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that he should not be too sure about his figures. He once stated that the former Senator from Nebraska would be elected by 100,000 votes, and the people of Nebraska defeated him by nearly 110,000 votes.

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I should like to correct the figures of the junior Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. WHERRY. I will yield the floor when I am through.

Mr. President, I have sat silently by for nearly 2 months. I wish to say that the time has come when the philosophy of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. ROBERTSON] should apply in this great body and throughout this great land.

The people of my State elected me because I am absolutely opposed to the New Deal—not to the Jeffersonian form of democratic government, but to new dealism. A similar situation prevailed in Wyoming, where I campaigned for the junior Senator from Wyoming. The people of that State believed that they had had enough of regimentation and dictatorship. We new Senators come here bringing with us the mandate of the people, who have said that they are fed up with the New Deal and do not want any more of it.

New Deal appointment after New Deal appointment is proposed. We have sat idly by in the case of most of them. We did attack the appointment of Edward J. Flynn—and rightly so. We attacked the appointment of Josh Lee—and rightly so. Josh Lee is not qualified to fill the office to which he has been appointed. We have had the appointment of Prentiss Brown, Mr. Herring, and others. They have been repudiated by the people of their own States because the people are against the philosophy which they represent. They have been promoted by the President to further new dealism in this country, and extend it to the four corners of the earth.

Mr. President, the people of the country expect from this young group of Senators the philosophy of government which they want represented in the Senate. When we say that from the bottom of our hearts we want cooperation with the President, we mean it. In his war policy we will go the limit. I know what war is. I had something to do with it in the First World War. However, when New Deal political appointments are brought before us and we are asked to "rubber stamp" them by way of confirmation, we will not do so because the appointees do not represent the will of the people of the Middle West. We shall be opposed to such nominations. If the President and Senators want our cooperation, let them leave politics out of the war issue and make appointments from both the Republican and Democratic sides. Let us have men who will provide leadership which will win the war, instead of the leadership which has torn us down and brought us to the condition in which we are today.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the pending nomination. I shall be against any other political appointment which brings into the Senate the philosophy of the New Deal, which has been defeated in the Middle West and will be defeated in 1944.

Mr. TUNNELL. Mr. President, it is to be regretted if partisan State politics is to be constantly injected into the consideration or approval of appointments of men whose standing cannot be questioned by intelligent persons from any section of the country. The gentleman whose nomination has been attacked will stand as well in the scale of ability as any of those attacking him. There could be nothing but cheap partisan politics in objecting to a man of Mr. Schwartz's type. It is to be regretted that Senators who say they are speaking for the country, but who are in fact speaking for their own States, object to national service on the ground that the State of Mr. Schwartz has said by a few thousand votes that he should not continue in service in the Senate. The United States is entitled to the service of this man regardless of any particular State. The pending appointment is not a State appointment, and it should not be rejected because of petty politics from State sources.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to this nomination?

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to say anything with reference to the nomination of former Senator Schwartz because I believe that he is well known on both sides of the Chamber. I think he is well qualified.

I take issue with the junior Senator from Nebraska when he says that so-called "lame ducks" should not be appointed to office. I prefer "lame duck" Democrats to some of those who have been holding office heretofore. I happen to be a partisan Democrat because I believe in party politics and in the principles of the Democratic Party. I wish that some of those who are now holding office in the various departments of the Government could be supplanted by Democrats who lost in the elections last fall. I think it would be better for the Government and for all concerned.

The point I am endeavoring to make, Mr. President, is that I do not object to a Republican or a Democrat. If the people of Nebraska wish to have in the Senate the Senator who now represents that State, it is the business of the people of Nebraska and not of the people of New Mexico, or any other State in the Union. I respect what Nebraska did, even though I should have preferred that a Democratic Senator be elected. Both Republicans and Democrats have been objecting because every Tom, Dick, and Harry, and every fair-haired boy from New York, Brooklyn, and elsewhere has been getting a job in Washington. I am glad that "lame duck" Democrats are being appointed, even at this late hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to this nomination?

Mr. WHERRY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HILL. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

PRESENTATION OF AVIATION MEDAL TO THE PRESIDENT IN RECOGNITION OF HIS AFRICAN FLIGHT

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I ask unanimous consent that I may report back without amendment from the Committee on the Library Senate Concurrent Resolution 7. I wonder if I could get consent to take the concurrent resolution up now? It is merely a measure requesting the Secretary of the Treasury to strike a suitable medal to be presented to the President as a token of esteem for his contribution to aviation by his recent flight across the Atlantic. There are no public funds involved. The expense is to be met by private subscription. Indeed, money has already been raised to strike the medal to be presented to the President for his contribution to aviation by his trip. The presentation is sponsored by the International Association of Aviation, it is in the interest of aviation, and the expenses are to be paid by the International Association.

I would not insist on having this resolution taken up now if any Senator objected. I do not believe it is a matter to which anyone would object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the report and the consideration of the concurrent resolution at this time?

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 7) was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Secretary of the Treasury is requested to strike a gold medal of appropriate design with suitable emblems, devices, and inscriptions to be determined by the Secretary, for presentation to President Franklin Delano Roosevelt in recognition of his contribution in inspiring confidence in aviation as a means of travel by his unprecedented flight to the "unconditional surrender" conference with Prime Minister Winston Churchill at Casablanca, North Africa.

SEC. 2. Any expenses necessary to carry out the purpose of this concurrent resolution shall be paid by the American Section of the Ligue Internationale des Aviateurs.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY

Mr. BARKLEY. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, March 1, 1943, at 12 o'clock noon.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1943

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Unto Thee, our Father in heaven, we offer our tributes of praise for the glorious hope in our Saviour. With the friction of nations in their woeful agony, the collisions of classes and current disputations we would hear Thy assuring voice: "Great shall be the peace of Thy children." This ageless truth forever shines forth in noonday splendor.

Oh, allow not the atmosphere of brotherhood to be wrenched by murmurings, skepticisms, or despairs. Do thou condescend to human infirmity and chide it that the low-flying things may give place to high-up realities; our souls mounting to the altar of dedication. We would acknowledge Thee to be the Lord and be still and know that Thou art God. In the court of human life we pray for the power of that faith which is the necessity of the soul, made heroic by those who stand and wait. We beseech Thee that this stained and sorrow-blackened world shall feel the withering might of freedom's arm and every man hearing its clarion note, shall be challenged to follow in its train. Almighty

God, in great wisdom and peace be with our Speaker and the Congress. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

O. P. A. DIRECTOR BROWN

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, in the speech delivered by O. P. A. Director Brown, he called for the rebirth of unity, and then proceeded to willfully misstate the facts with reference to the Committee on Un-American Activities, when he stated falsely that the committee was leading the forces in this country that were fighting Russia. In that connection, Mr. Speaker, may I call attention to the fact that the British Labor Party of England was able to distinguish between the Communists in England and Russia, when it rejected membership or affiliation of the Communist Party in the British labor movement. The reason given was that the primary loyalty of the Communist Party in Great Britain, which officially describes itself as the British section of the Communist International, is to the Communist International and the British Labor Party unanimously refused to permit the Communist Party of Great Britain to affiliate with it. When O. P. A. Director Brown calls for a rebirth of unity and then proceeds to misrepresent and libel a committee of this House, then it seems to me he is setting a poor example of unity.

UNITY

Mr. FOLGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks by including an editorial from the Evening Star newspaper and an article from the newspaper.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. FOLGER. Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great interest last night to Raymond Gram Swing. He was commenting upon our situation as to unity. I am sorry that I am overwhelmed with the idea that we are doing too much professing unity and too little in actually practicing it. The excerpts that I offer in the extension and the revising of my remarks relate to unity among the allies, including Russia, and Josef Stalin, for whom I have the greatest respect, and to whom you and I owe a debt of gratitude.

RATIONING AND INCREASED FOOD SUPPLY

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? There was no objection.

[Mr. ELLIOTT addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

BLAIR HOUSE

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I see by the newspapers that $8,000 a guest is the cost to the United States at Blair House, and that additional funds are sought to entertain noted foreigners. If Mr. Harry Hopkins and family will move out of the White House and pay board for a time, they will make room for some of these interesting dignitaries, and Blair House will not be in need of an additional appropriation.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ROLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix and include an editorial and a resolution that appear in the San Francisco Examiner, in connection with the Pacific war area.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the Appendix.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? There was no objection.

FOOD RATIONING

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I would not stand in the Well of the House and indulge in carping criticism. I believe, however, it is the duty of any Member of this body to bring to the attention of the Congress and of the country what he believes to be a wrong procedure in the Office of Price Administration, in placing its present rationing program into effect.

Mr. Speaker, a penalty is being practiced on the loyal housewife who heeded the plea of Federal authorities against food hoarding. On the other hand, it appears a premium is given to the individual who purchased, in some instances, thousands of cans of unnecessary food. It overflowed pantry shelves and was stored in basement and attic.

I now come to the specific instance. An 8-point-per-can ration deduction has been made by the O. P. A. I believe this to be an injustice, because 15 to 29 points are needed for purchase of a similar can of food. The person who has not hoarded is, therefore, at a disadvantage, and I do not believe such a policy should be countenanced. In other words, we should place a premium on patriotism and not on hoarding. The latter group are chuckling at what has happened. They know they are in a preferred position. I shall place in the Appendix of the RECORD, with the permission of the House, a statement the Office of Price Administration is making today, due to my charge that this inequity is being allowed. I do not feel fairness will be practiced if the O. P. A. continues its plan. We cannot purchase a can of food with less than approximately 15 points, yet only 8 points are deducted per can for those who have hoarded.

Our people know it is necessary to have rationing. Let us have it on common-sense lines—not on a 2-to-1 balance in favor of the persons who overstocked.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GATHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include an editorial.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include therein a radio address made by my colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? There was no objection.

OUT-PRODUCING THE AXIS

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, according to a report made by the War Production Board to a Senate committee on day before yesterday, America at present is out-producing the Axis by 2½ to 1. If this be true, it is the greatest accomplishment from an industrial standpoint that ever has been made by any people at any time in the history of the world. On it can be built victory in this war. Our problems are by no means solved, nor should we be content or satisfied with our accomplishments, but I think it well to point this out at least as a step in progress.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include a joint resolution passed by the Legislature of Texas approving the bill of my distinguished and able colleague from Texas, Judge MANSFIELD, being House Resolution 6999.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. HOLMES of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include an editorial from the Washington Post this morning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? There was no objection.

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein a short article on income tax.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. Speaker, I also ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include two letters on the meat situation.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BALDWIN of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include a letter from the New York Times.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NORMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include a letter from Mr. Bozarth, a prominent dairyman in my district.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAFOLLETTE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include a speech by Hon. Harold E. Stassen, of Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMPSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include an article on the farm-labor problem by Guy R. Erdley.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McWILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix and include therein a letter from one of my constituents.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein an editorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRANT of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include a column written by my predecessor, Hon. Samuel B. Pettengill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PROTECTION OF THE CAPITOL

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, we are hearing a great deal about the shortage of manpower these days. In checking up I find that we have 55 privates and 2 officers guarding the House Office Buildings and the Capitol. We have a very competent police force at the Capitol and I am taking the floor for the purpose of suggesting to the War Department that they remove the superfluous guards that we have up here and put them where they are more needed, and turn the guarding of the Capitol and the office buildings over to the Capitol Police. With the shortage in manpower all useless tasks should be abolished.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SMITH of Virginia). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I am utterly amazed at my colleague from Minnesota, a man usually of splendid judgment and absolute fairness.

We have on this hill $180,000,000 worth of property. We have a few Metropolitan Police around here and we have some boys, who are on patronage, wearing police uniforms. Without these soldiers, in a time like this, that would be all the protection we would have for this $180,000,000 worth of property.

If a bomb should fall here those men on the ground will not be of any help to us. They cannot protect us. It happens to be the business of the Speaker of the House of Representatives to protect the property on this hill, and it cannot be protected by a few Metropolitan Police, who are only loaned to us, and a few patronage boys, who are fine boys, who want to come here to go to school. But some day or some night somebody may come into this building and destroy a million dollars worth of property. As long as I have the responsibility, I am going to keep somebody here to protect these buildings.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BURGIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include a brief editorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HOUSE RESOLUTION 136

Mr. PATTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House Resolution 136, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the expenses of conducting the investigation authorized by House Resolution 102 of the Seventy-eighth Congress, incurred by the special committee appointed to conduct such investigation, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, not to exceed $60,000, including expenditures for the employment of legal and other experts, and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by such committee, signed by the chairman thereof, and approved by the Committee on Accounts.

SEC. 2. That the official committee reporters may be used at all hearings held in the District of Columbia, if not otherwise officially engaged.

The resolution was agreed to and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, it may not be out of the way, in view of certain remarks made having to do with the protection of the Capitol, the House Office Building, and what is generally known as Capitol Hill, especially in view of the statements made that the wooden guns we see on the office buildings constitute our protection, for any Member of the House before he makes any such statement to consult the War Department and inform himself of the inner and outer ring of high caliber antiaircraft guns in position for the protection of Capitol Hill and in fact all of Washington.

ELECTION CONTEST: SULLIVAN AGAINST MILLER

Mr. PETERSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged resolution (H. Res. 137) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the joint application for order of recount of John B. Sullivan, contestant, against Lewis E. Miller, contestee, Eleventh District of Missouri, be not granted.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute on this resolution.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, the unanimous action of this committee successfully undertakes to establish the fact, the law, and a precedent for all time that jurisdiction of an alleged contested-election case cannot be conferred on the House or on one of its committees by any joint agreement of parties to an alleged election contest unofficially or otherwise submitted.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RENTAL ALLOWANCES TO OFFICERS OF THE ARMED FORCES

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of H. R. 1746, and ask unanimous consent to substitute S. 641, to amend section 6 of the Pay Readjustment Act of 1942 relating to the payment of rental allowances to certain officers.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Georgia explain the bill?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the distinguished gentleman from Oregon, Mr. MOTT, seek recognition, as the bill was to be presented to the House from the Naval Affairs Committee, the gentleman from Oregon to explain to the House the purpose of this proposed bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, it would be better to put the question on the gentleman's request that the bill be considered, with the understanding that the gentleman from Oregon will explain it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the fourth paragraph of section 6 of the Pay Readjustment Act of 1942, approved June 16, 1942, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"No rental allowance shall accrue to an officer having no dependents while he is on field duty unless his commanding officer certifies that he was necessarily required to procure quarters at his own expense, or while on sea duty, except for temporary periods of sea duty not exceeding 3 months, nor shall any rental allowance accrue to an officer with or without dependents who is assigned quarters at his permanent station unless a competent superior authority of the service concerned certifies that such quarters are not occupied because of being inadequate for the occupancy of the officer and his dependents, if any, and such certifications shall be conclusive: Provided, That an officer, although furnished with quarters, shall be entitled to rental allowance as authorized in this section if by reason of orders of competent authority his dependents are prevented from occupying such quarters."

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to amend section 6 of the Pay Readjustment Act of 1942 so as to permit the payment of rental allowances to officers who have dependents while they are on field duty and when the commanding officer certifies that the officer has been required to rent quarters at his own expense and also to provide that naval officers without dependents may have rental allowance when they are necessarily on sea duty for a limited time, not to exceed 4 months.

Section 6 of the pay readjustment bill provided, among other things, for rental allowance for officers who have dependents to whom quarters have not been assigned. These were fixed at amounts ranging from $45 to $105 per month, but when such officers were on field duty no rental allowance was provided for them. The Comptroller General a short time ago decided that under the language of that act no officer without dependents could be entitled to rental allowance regardless of whether he was assigned to Government quarters or not, which was never the intention of the Congress. The Comptroller General is of the opinion that the ruling he made may probably contravene the will of Congress and has agreed to suspend operation of this order until March 1. In the meantime it is necessary to pass this bill before March 1 so that these officers without dependents who are necessarily required to secure quarters at their own expense, and also naval officers who are on sea duty not exceeding 4 months may receive rental allowance.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOTT. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. This bill applies to the Army as well as to naval and marine officers.

Mr. MOTT. That is right. The bill as originally considered applied only to the Navy, marines, and Coast Guard; but the War Department suggested that it be amended to include the Army also; so a Senate bill covering all of these services was substituted in the committee for the House bill.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOTT. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Let us take the case of a married man on duty on shipboard; would he be granted these allowances while he is on duty and away from his base?

Mr. MOTT. On temporary duty only, not if he is assigned to permanent sea duty.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

(Mr. SMITH of Virginia asked and was given permission to revise and extend his own remarks in the RECORD.)

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF]?

There was no objection.

[Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

(Mr. LAMBERTSON asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD.)

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my own remarks and to include therein a bill which I have introduced to reach certain tax dodgers in the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]?

There was no objection.

[Mr. RANKIN addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

FURNISHING OF PROCESSED FOOD TO RANCHERS IN THE WEST

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR]?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, something has got to be done to relieve the situation in States such as my own where distances are great from source of supply with reference to the furnishing of an adequate amount of processed food to our ranchers, both sheep and cattle men. We must make sufficient processed foods available to the sheep and cattle men or they will close shop.

I received a very interesting telegram this morning from the Garfield County Sheepman's Committee reading as follows:

MILES CITY, MONT., February 25, 1943.
Representative JAMES F. O'CONNOR,
United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Present processed food rationing for sheepmen and ranchers is as sensible as the War Production Board's suggestion that lambing be postponed until better weather. Urge you to recommend that sheepmen be given some consideration in amount of their allotment and to be allowed to buy in quantities.

GARFIELD COUNTY
SHEEPMAN'S COMMITTEE,
E. L. ALEXANDER, Chairman.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL, FISCAL YEAR 1943

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1975) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1943, and for prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1943, and for other purposes; and pending that, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I can arrange with the gentleman from New York for debate to continue for the rest of the day, to be equally divided between the gentleman from New York and myself, and to read the first paragraph of the bill before the Committee rises tonight?

Mr. TABER. But take no action on it?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Not beyond reading the first paragraph.

Mr. TABER. That is satisfactory.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, then I ask unanimous consent that debate continue throughout the day, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] and one-half by myself, and that the first paragraph of the bill be read before the Committee rises this evening.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON]?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 1975, with Mr. SMITH of Virginia in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, this is an economy bill. It is true it aggregates in appropriations and contractual authority the sum of $6,298,000,000—an amount which even in bills of large denominations could not be counted by any Member of this House within his lifetime—a sum so stupendous that the finite mind of man cannot comprehend its purchasing power. But, Mr. Chairman, I dare say the committee has never reported a bill more carefully scrutinized or more closely trimmed

While more than 99 percent of the appropriations carried in this bill are directly connected with the war program, outside of one item, the item for the Maritime Commission, we have reduced the estimate submitted to us by more than 10 percent. Considering the fact that in the last session of Congress we pruned more than $1,000,000,000 from the supply bills of the previous year, this further reduction in excess of 10 percent constitutes a notable economy and more than conforms to the commitments of the committee to continue its policy of drastic retrenchment.

At the same time it should be pointed out that we have denied no funds actually necessary to the prosecution of the war and the transaction of the normal business of the country.

Mr. Chairman, the bill is in keeping with the record made by the committee and the House in the Seventy-seventh Congress. The results secured through the expenditure of funds provided for the current fiscal year border on the miraculous. Never since Aladdin touched the wonderful lamp has so much been accomplished in so short a time. Starting from scratch, on the tragic December 7, 1941, we have put more men on the firing line, better equipped, better trained, better clothed, better housed, better fed, better hospitalized, and better paid—more efficient fighting men—than have ever been sent to the front in a like period of time, by any nation in the history of the world. And if anyone doubts any single item in that inventory let him ask the men themselves—and if still incredulous let him ask the Japs and the Nazis. The Nation is being defended. Its shores are being held intact and inviolate. With little time to prepare, it is winning victories from seasoned foes. No other Allied nation has made, and is making, so valorous a stand—or is being so well served and so well defended.

And yet, believe it or not, the highways and byways, the press and the air, are filled with querulous complaints.

"Congress has bungled. Congress is playing politics. Congress is wasting money. The war program is being neglected. Congress has failed to dot the i's and cross the t's. Nothing is right and everything is wrong."

May I take advantage of the occasion to ask here and now—in this greatest forum of the Nation and the world—in the opening consideration of the first war bill of the Seventy-eighth Congress for a bill of particulars? I now invite anyone to stand and in my time say wherein this committee or this House has been negligent or remiss or culpable in any respect in the conduct of the war, to point out specific instances in which this committee and this House has failed to come up to its opportunities and its obligations and its responsibilities, to point out one dollar that should have been appropriated that was not appropriated or one dollar that was appropriated that should not have been appropriated.

It is easy enough to stand on the street corners and make general charges and demand that Congress and the high command be consigned individually and collectively to perdition for alleged sins of omission or commission. But I am asking you now to put your finger on the heinous and outrageous instance or situation or condition to which you refer in your generalities. Please do not hesitate to interrupt me. I will be glad to give you time. And do not hesitate to offer amendments to this bill. If anyone charges Congress with extravagance or waste or maladministration let them speak now. We want to know about it.

If further economies can be made in this bill we want to make them, and we will help you make them.

It is natural for people to complain. That is an American privilege. It is a privilege you would not have in Germany or Italy or Japan. It is one of the privileges we are fighting to maintain—the right to go out on the street and "cuss" any man from the President and the Governor down to the mayor and the constable. And at the time we are making our loudest "squawk" we realize that we have less to complain about than any people on the face of the globe.

Life has been easy for us here in America—easier than we appreciate. We have become so accustomed to plenty and liberty and freedom of speech that we impose on it. We do not even want to slice the bread, or wear trousers without cuffs, or be rationed.

There was bitter complaint that we were shipping butter to Russia and yet that butter helped Russian heroes to roll back the resistless tide of invasion that would have swamped not only Russia but every free nation, including our own. What would every American home be enduring today in privation and peril but for the gallant stand Russia has made when all others were driven back? And yet there were those who were unwilling to put a little butter on the black bread of the Russian boy whose bayonet was making it possible for their own boys to stay a few months longer at home.

Usual supplies of gas on the streets of your city mean American blood on the decks of the Pacific Fleet and the sands of Africa, and yet there were those who denounced Congress and the Government because they could not have the usual supply of gas to drive out and make "whoopee" on Saturday night.

Complaint about the rationing of shoes puts a patriotic citizen in the class of those who would go back to the darkest days of the Revolution when American soldiers left bloody footprints in the snow at Valley Forge.

Sugar on every table at home means insufficient explosives at the front. That last bowl of sugar may mean the last shot in some boy's gun as the Japs pour over the breastworks at Guadalcanal.

Scarcity of beef and pork at your butcher shop means a square meal over there—with enough energy to make a winning charge against heavy odds when the battle hangs in the balance.

American marines eating a sliver of mule meat in the fox holes of Bataan, trying to grind with their teeth the dry rice they could not even cook on Wake Island, and with nothing at all those bitter days of defeat in Tunisia, would have been glad to slice their own bread. But the people who are enjoying the usual home life for whom these boys are starving and dying—for whom their blood reddens the soil of an alien land 3,000 miles from everything they hold dear—beat their breasts and shriek to high heaven because they have to slice their own bread.

And while we are on that subject, it might be well to explain that the cloth saved by taking the cuffs off of trousers is this year making 600,000 complete suits of clothing. And discontinuation of sliced bread effects three economies: The slicing machinery is needed by the armed forces; the paper required to wrap sliced bread contains chemicals badly needed in the manufacture of munitions; and unsliced bread is less subject to deterioration. When the war is over and the long years of peace come once more and grandchildren ask what we did to help win the war, there will be those who can say proudly: "I complained because I had to slice the bread."

But let me get back to what Congress has done for these boys. Although the American camps of 1898 teemed with disease and vermin and death—although one camp in Ohio in 1918 was unable to supply coffins fast enough to care for the victims of the epidemic of influenza which swept every concentration of troops that year—there has not been a single epidemic or contagion in any American camp in this war. There are not even any cooties. And, remarkable as it may seem, the health rate is much higher in our cantonments than it is in civil life. In other words, there are men in our armed forces who are well and robust today who would not be alive if they had remained in civilian life.

As an example of the efficacy of our hospitalization, the percentage of wounded who recovered from the bombing at Pearl Harbor breaks all records in the history of military medicine.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Because the gentleman is discussing the relative health situation of military and civil life, may I call to the attention of the committee the fact that the Civil Service Subcommittee yesterday heard testimony that 12 percent of those persons who were separated from Government employment did so because of ill health.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. That is a corroborating situation. A comparison of the health of civilians with that of men in the service is decidedly in favor of service conditions, and is a tribute to the efficacy of our Medical Corps and the efficiency of the Congress in making the necessary provision for the service.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Is the gentleman satisfied that we have an adequate number of hospitals to care for the disabled? I am troubled because I am told that some of our men coming back from overseas are being sent to insane asylums or in some cases to jails because there is no place for them in the hospitals. I am checking up on that, but I want the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. There has never been, there is not today, and there never will be sufficient hospitals in a world war, but we are meeting the need more promptly and by larger percentages than ever before in the medical history of warfare.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. MILLER of Nebraska. Can the gentleman give us any figures as to the number of individuals wounded, and the mortality rate of those who have been wounded in the war, how many are dying?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Of course, we cannot as yet give exact figures for any period, and especially current figures; that is confidential information. As a matter of fact any figures we would give on current casualties, even if available, would be obsolete, as they increase daily, unfortunately. I may say however, that in proportion to the number of men involved, in proportion to disadvantages under which we are advancing on all fronts, the number at this time is gratifyingly small.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I am told that the Navy has a remarkable training of first aid, when men are wounded. They are treated in a primary way, and almost immediately taken to a field hospital, which is better than anything ever done before in the care of the wounded.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. And further, each man is equipped with an emergency kit, with emergency drugs for self-application, and a very large number of lives have been saved which would have been lost in former wars, because they are in a position to take primary care of their wounds. Our men have had not only improved equipment and supplies, but they have been infinitely better trained. In France, in 1918, General Pershing deplored the lack of training, "the lack of military information on certain points" displayed by American officers from colonels down, arriving in France.

Mr. RIZLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. RIZLEY. Can the gentleman give us something about the comparative cost of training men in this war as compared with the other?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Of course the training in this war is more expensive than in the last war, first, because there is a longer period of training and it is more comprehensive. And, second, because costs entering into the courses given are heavier. Naturally the cost varies with the character and nature of the course. But we have provided everything needed to train a man to take care of himself and his men, and we have never hesitated to appropriate money for training when we thought we were getting value received.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. And I may state that the taxpayers would not object to any money that is spent along that line.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I am very glad to hear the gentleman say that. As between spending too much and spending too little, as between having ample requirements and having inadequate funds, I do not think there is a single man in this House who would differ with the policy of the committee putting sufficient men on the front line in time and with enough to do the job.

Mr. ROWE. And in addition to the costs being greater, by reason of the time, is there not an additional element to consider in that the percentage of mechanical equipment and extensive training require increased cost?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. That is perhaps the most important element of cost. The planes of 1918 were hardly more than kites, while the Flying Fortresses of today are among the most intricate and expensive machines produced in this mechanical age. That same is true in the comparison of tanks and all other war equipment. And the gratifying feature of it is that all branches of warfare and character of equipment is being produced in record time and with record efficiency. A recent report from Mr. Donald Nelson was that the manufacture of munitions, the production of planes, the output of guns, and the launching of ships tops not only American records but is greater in both volume and value of the mechanical output of any modern nation—in peace or in war. We are producing every month more than was produced in any previous month in any land or in any industry. American industry and labor, fed by American agriculture, is winning the war.

But no tribute to those who are serving the Nation in this war would be complete without reference to the extraordinary contribution of President Roosevelt. Without his foresight we would not be a free people today. He came to the Presidency at the close of a decade that had been devoted to disarmament—when disarmament meant dismantling of the American Navy.

In 1922 the Washington Conference had solemnly agreed to gradual disarmament and the five contracting powers, including Japan had bound themselves to sink a percentage of their ships and retard and eventually abandon new construction. It was in keeping with the temper of the American people.

We hoped and believed that at last the millenium was about to dawn and the peoples of the world dwell together in permanent peace and amity. Apparently the world had reached a stage of civilization when war could be relegated to the limbo of the barbaric past and we could now sink our battleships and beat our swords into plowshares, and our spears into pruning hooks. We entered wholeheartedly into the agreement, and we kept our agreement.

Japan signed the protocol and prostituted it to her advantage in preparing for a war she had long had in contemplation, an advantage and a program which but for President Roosevelt, would have been fatal to the American people.

In the period between 1922, the year of the first conference, and 1934 our Government laid down only 35 combatant ships. During that period Japan, in contravention of the commitments of the conference, laid down 119 ships. When President Roosevelt came to the Presidency the temper of the American people and the temper of this Congress was adverse to spending money on armaments. We were especially adverse to building up the Navy. Men on the floor of the House said, and said very properly as it seemed at that time, "What is the use spending millions of dollars to build battleships we will take out and sink the next time we have a disarmament conference?" So when President Roosevelt recommended expansion of the naval program, we demurred. I remember very well, and other Members who were here in 1932, 1933, and 1934 will remember, that we went along with the President's naval construction program very reluctantly. But, fortunately for the Nation, we went.

Under President Roosevelt's plan we constructed 30 combatant ships, 8 dreadnoughts, 12 cruisers, 2 aircraft carriers, 65 destroyers, and 36 submarines. In the next 7 years we built 153 vital naval units. In the previous 11 years we had built only 35, as contrasted with the 7 years in which we built 153. The important thing is that at the end of that 7 years we not only had the ships but we had the manufacturing facilities for producing ships and naval equipment which we would otherwise not have had. More than that, we had the trained personnel, trained officers, whom we would not have had had we not followed the program laid down by President Roosevelt.

I make no statement of the significance of the situation. A statement is not necessary, but I ask you what would have been our position after Pearl Harbor if we had pursued the program we were pursuing in the decade following the Washington Conference? And what would have been our situation without these ships, this naval strength, these manufacturing facilities, and this naval personnel—the direct and immediate result of the policy of President Roosevelt—on December 7, 1941?

The figures speak for themselves. The significant thing is that the President did not advocate a similar program with regard to the Army. Looking at it 10 years afterward we can see unmistakably the President's policy. He advocated the construction of a navy as a protection and not with an idea of ever having to use it in war. He knew, as all American statesmen had begun to realize at that time, that Japan had designs which we must be in a position to meet. He looked upon the Navy as a shotgun behind the door. If we had it Japan would never attack us. He did not realize at that time, nor did anyone else, that Japan had long since entered upon a program of controlling the Pacific Ocean. There are very frank statements on record now in which Japanese statesmen said that the Pacific Ocean was a Japanese ocean and they expected to control it. We know now that that was and is their objective.

What would have been our position after Pearl Harbor if we had been without the ships and the men and the facilities which President Roosevelt's policy gave us?

In contrast, the President did not build up a corresponding Army. Why? Because he did not expect to go to war. At a comparatively late date we had an Army of only 136,000 men, an Army smaller than the Army of Rumania. No one can look at that record and doubt for a moment that his idea was to prevent war and not to provoke war. No one can now doubt that but for his wise, far-sighted policy we would have been helpless in this greatest crisis in our national history.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. JENSEN. I agree with the gentleman thoroughly that the President did not think we were going into a war with Japan. If he had, I am sure America would not have furnished all the materials to build that great navy for Japan.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman is right, with perhaps this reservation. Even had we known positively and officially of Japan's plan of attack, we could not have denied her materials unless we were ready to precipitate the war at a time when we were woefully unprepared and when we were striving earnestly and sincerely to avoid war. Secretary Hull worked up until the last minute in an endeavor to avoid war. Up to the last we depended on the superiority of our Navy to prevent war.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I agree with about everything the gentleman has said. The Congress in 1937 passed a law giving the President the power to place an embargo upon all war materials, that is in the rough, or in the raw, being sent to Japan. In June 1939 I made the statement on the floor of the House that Japan was our greatest menace and that I thought the President should have placed an embargo upon the shipment of what amounted to 54 percent of the materials Japan was using for the construction of the war materials and war equipment about which the gentleman is talking. Personally, I always thought the President should have used the power given him by Congress to place an embargo upon the shipment of those materials.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman and I were in complete accord; but looking back at it even now, as long as there was a chance to maintain peace, as long as there was a possibility of keeping out of war—and that was unquestionably the will of the American people—to have taken that step would have been notice to Japan that we anticipated war and were ready to meet it. We would have been the aggressor.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. JENSEN. In view of what the gentleman said, I wonder if he thinks that the American Congress, or this Congress, or the President of the United States in future will ever permit a thing like that to happen where we absolutely furnish the materials to some other nation to build up a great armament to be used against us by her.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I am glad the gentleman takes that position because we must not only win this war on terms of unconditional surrender but we must completely disarm these predatory nations and we must maintain airfields and bridgeheads in strategic positions over the world to prevent them from rearming. We must not only deny them supplies, but we must maintain a surveillance that will prevent them again disturbing the peace of the world.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I know that the gentleman will agree that any traffic in war preparation materials which is carried on for the sake of profit is basically wrong from a moral standpoint; we all know that; but I ask the gentleman whether in his opinion it does not appear to be true that at any time when America had taken drastic action in this matter of shipments to Japan, Japan was apparently ready to strike? Hence the taking of such action necessarily had to be when, as, and if this Nation was ready to follow through with the consequences thereof. Does not the gentleman believe that is true?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Exactly; there was only one ground upon which we could deny these materials to Japan, and that was solely, wholly, and only upon the ground that we thought she was using them to prepare armament to be used against us; and whenever we took that position, in the eyes of the chancelries of the world we invited war.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Our distinguished chairman has brought out a thought that I have wanted to explore a little in connection with this bill and the committee report, and if he will permit me I will bring it in at this point in the debate.

The gentleman from Missouri has laid down the proposition that we must maintain bridgeheads and keep these predatory nations unarmed, we will say. I wish to submit this question because to me it is perhaps one of the hottest issues of today; it ties directly into this: Are our people in this country prepared mentally and financially to put up the necessary dollars in the form of taxes to carry on such a program? That is question No. 1.

Question No. 2 is this: Coming directly to the bill here, the committee report on page 14 and the bill on page 25 shows a deficiency item of $6,150,000 to put the Bureau of Internal Revenue of the Treasury Department in position to collect $8,000,000,000 of additional taxes assessed by the revenue act we passed last year. Here is a deficiency bill, as I understand, for $6,000,000,000 and more. Is that correct?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. That is right.

Mr. CRAWFORD. This is a deficiency bill. Our budget for the fiscal year now running called for $8,000,000,000 of additional taxes as set forth on page 14 of the committee report. We are now appropriating $6,150,000 to facilitate and implement the Bureau of Internal Revenue in collecting that $8,000,000,000. At the same time we have a proposition here before us on the Hill where it is being proposed that that $8,000,000,000 of taxes be canceled or forgotten. Now, I raise that question and tie it in with the gentleman's comment to the effect that we must maintain bridgeheads, maintain standing armies, disarm and keep disarmed predatory nations; and I want to ask the gentleman to comment on this whole thing not only as to whether or not in his opinion with so many millions of our people and so many Members of this House in a frame of mind to cancel, and forget, and forgive taxes, whether or not we are prepared morally to go ahead and take on that job at this time.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. My good friend for whom I have the highest regard and for whose economic opinions I have very wholesome respect is, of course, going very far afield when he wants to leave the bill and talk about a subject entirely foreign to the province of our committee. I must not encroach upon the jurisdiction of the prerogatives of my good friend from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON].

In answer to the gentleman's first question, Shall we maintain airfields and bridgeheads to prevent a recurrence of this world holocaust? may I say that up to this time we have tried everything else. You know, I know, and we all know beyond peradventure of a doubt that if Germany and Japan are allowed to rearm, it is only a question of time before my grandson and your grandson, if not my son and your son, will have to fight this war all over again. Is there any man on this floor who has any doubt about that? If so let him rise now and enter his objection. As often as they are permitted to rearm we will have to go through this same thing again, but it will be a little bit worse each time.

I think the gentleman rather magnifies the steps which it will be necessary to take. We will not need a large standing army. We can go back to the smallest standing army we have ever maintained in time of peace and hold these airfields and bridgeheads, because we operate now with airplanes and explosives. We do not have to occupy forts and maintain large bodies of troops. All that it is necessary is to keep sufficient explosives and airplanes and we can nip any outbreak in its incipiency.

So far as expense is concerned I believe any of you would be willing to put it up to any taxpayer in the country as to whether he wants to adopt a policy with assurances that it will prevent the robber nations of Europe from rearming and again running amuck or whether he wants to come back and spend billions, billions, and billions of dollars as we are spending them now simply because we did not take the proper steps to prevent a recurrence of this thing the last time we fought it out in a world war.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Going to the other phase of it, and coming right down to the bill, keeping out of the field of taxation as best we can, in the event the Congress within the next few weeks cancels the 1942 tax assessment as discussed on page 14 of the committee report, then what?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt? He is adopting a premise of "If such-and-such a thing is done."

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. But the premise does not pertain to this bill. If the gentleman insists, I shall be glad to have him make a statement, but we are getting clear away from the subject in hand.

Mr. CRAWFORD. No; I do not think so, because in that event would the $6,150,000 be necessary for the Internal Revenue Bureau?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The necessity for additional money is to carry out the laws of this Congress. If you want to carry out the laws, if you want them to carry out your directions to the Bureau of Internal Revenue for the collection of these taxes as provided by statute, they will have to have this money. If you do not propose to collect these taxes you do not need it.

Mr. GORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. Before the gentleman becomes too far removed from his suggestion that we maintain strategic outposts, I want to inquire of him if he does not think that we should hold them and others in collaboration with all nations who will join with us in a determination to preserve law and order and peace in the world?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I certainly feel we would be amiss in our trust to all civilized nations if we did not collaborate in the maintenance of the peace of the world.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Does not the gentleman agree there must be on the part of Americans, particularly those in the position of leadership in our Nation, a deeper consecration to America's responsibility in those regards than has ever existed before?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I was preparing to agree with the gentleman, but he takes in too much territory when he says "than has ever existed before." The President of the United States and representatives of the United States in the armed forces, the Army and Navy, for 150 years have consecrated themselves to this end. The pages of our history are full of men from Washington down who would sacrifice personal interest for common good. I ask anybody to suggest a method or course which President Roosevelt could have taken which would more completely and more adequately have carried out his oath of office, which would more adequately and more completely have maintained the integrity of our Nation and the perpetuity of our Government and our institutions than the course he did take? If you can suggest it, I will yield.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I agree completely with what the gentleman said and when I made the remark I did a moment ago the main reason I put it as I did was because I think we never before in our Nation have faced an international problem as acute as we do now. It is my earnest hope that at the conclusion of this war we will avoid some of the things which I believe were overlooked and neglected at the conclusion of the First World War.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I am in complete accord with the gentleman that the world was never so small and our responsibility was never so great.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. And our safety so dependent upon what happened on an international scale.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Precisely.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman has been expressing much better than I can some of the thoughts that have been going through my mind. I take it, however, that the gentleman is not trying now to give us a complete program for after-war safety; but laying down, rather, the cornerstone or the basic foundation of our future international policy. It may be that international organization will be needed, I am not competent to speak on that and I do not care to do so at this time; it may be that some justice as between nations in economics will be necessary for a lasting peace, but I believe that the task, as the gentleman has said, is such that we must see to it that a police power preserves peace and does so by keeping aggressor nations disarmed.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I am glad to hear the gentleman make that statement. Of course, we can adopt at this time only the broadest general directions. We cannot at this time determine the detail and the minutiae or even the framework by which this can be done. It will require the ability, the time, and the patriotism of the wisest men we have today to work it out.

On that account, I rather deplore the fact that we are omitting in this bill the provision for the National Resources Planning Board. We cannot wait until the time is upon us, until we reach the precipice; we must plan in advance. Every reasonable human being knows that there must be some forethought. Provision should be made now. Of course, Congress should itself take a direct hand in the matter, but we should at this time have appropriated to continue these activities in such a way that we could correlate them with the work of the Congress.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not believe there is a Member of the House who is not fully in accord with what the gentleman is saying, that we must lay the foundation for continued peace in this world or else civilization as we know it will be destroyed and lost.

Now, may I refer back to the colloquy we had a few moments ago with reference to placing an embargo upon the shipment of materials to Japan. May I remind the gentleman of the famous speech of the President, made in the city of Chicago in the fall of 1937, when he spoke about quarantining aggressor nations, referring to Japan, I think. It has always seemed to me that the reasonable interpretation of that speech was that trouble with Japan should be anticipated. Having that in mind, I always thought that the President should have placed that embargo following the passage of the act of Congress giving him the power to do so.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. To have done so would have amounted to a virtual declaration of war at that time. While we can look back now and see that war was inevitable, at that time we did not believe and the great majority of the American people did not believe that war was inevitable.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to my good friend from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. A moment ago the gentleman said that unless we disarmed Germany and Japan our grandsons if not our sons would be fighting this war over again. Did I understand the gentleman correctly?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I believe nobody objected to that statement at the time.

Mr. HOFFMAN. No. I am not objecting now. I just wanted to ask the gentleman whether or not he thought we could avoid these future wars and save our sons and our grandsons if we continued to meddle in every quarrel that came up over on the other side and placed our commercial interests above the welfare and the lives of our own citizens.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman understands, of course, that we are not in this trouble because of meddling.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I do not understand that at all.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. We are in it because Japan came like a thief in the night, and plunged a dagger in our back.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I am familiar with all that.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. But for Japan's action, we might never have been involved.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Can we continue to meddle in the quarrels over there—I will leave out the "continue"—can we meddle in the quarrels over there and keep out of war?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. That is like the question, When did you stop beating your wife? We have not been meddling.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Does the gentleman mean to say that sending ships into belligerent waters and carrying munitions of war was not meddling?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Absurd. Germany declared war first, Italy declared war first. Japan, without excuse and without notice, in probably the most reprehensible international action ever taken by any nation, made it a matter of self-preservation.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Concerning the inquiry with reference to why an embargo was not imposed against Japan, I think it is known, or should be known, that an embargo was not leveled against Japan because it was known that if such an embargo were leveled it would precipitate war with Japan. Our Navy advised the State Department that we were not prepared to go to war with Japan. It was, therefore, to prevent war that an embargo was not imposed.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman has stated the situation exactly.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MAY. The only reason I asked the gentleman to yield is to clear up a misunderstanding. In addition to the fact that the administration was doing everything it could to keep us out of war, after that bill was passed by the Congress—and it came out of the House Committee on Military Affairs after weeks of hearings—it was known that all of the strategic war materials in the Far East, such as rubber and tin, were being made available to this Government, and if we had shut down on Japan promptly we would not have gotten millions and millions of pounds of critical materials that we did get. That was a good reason for delaying the embargo.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. There can be no question about our position at the time. We took the only course open.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. I was interested in the question of the gentleman from Michigan. To me it was a rather shocking question. It reveals that the gentleman is still laboring under the illusion that this great Nation, the most powerful nation in the world, can hold itself aloof, that by keeping our ships out of belligerent waters, by staying out of quarrels, and all of the other old isolationist phrases, we can remain at peace. Surely the gentleman should realize by this time that this Government must shoulder its responsibility, that we must take a part in preventing these quarrels from developing into wars of aggression, which inevitably engulf the whole world.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The United States in neither the First World War nor in the present World War has had any ulterior motive. At the close of the last World War we were in a position to take the lion's share of the spoils, but we did not take a foot of land, we did not take a dollar of indemnity. We did not take a single trade advantage. We did not ask for a single commercial concession. We came home empty handed, bringing our dead with us, and an imperishable record for unselfish service to Christian civilization that has never been equaled in the annals of mankind. That is our position today. We do not want to meddle with the affairs of any nation. We do not want a foot of territory. We do not want any commercial advantages, we do not want any trade treaties or material advantages of any kind. We want to maintain only our right to live our own way and maintain the freedom of all nations.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Misouri. Yes.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I do not understand the gentleman's two statements. I do not see how they coincide—that we are in war because Japan attacked us and that war was inevitable. The gentleman made both statements.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. It was inevitable because Japan had planned it for 25 years. Japan announced after she opened this war that she was going to make the terms of peace in the White House. Her leaders said that their allies might have the territory east of the Rocky Mountains, but they wanted the Pacific coast because the Pacific Ocean was a Japan pond and they proposed to control it. Their first start was in Alaska, and they are in Alaska this afternoon—the first stop on their way to take our coast west of the Rockies. It was inevitable. Japan made it inevitable; and her attack was the first step in furtherance of the determination to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. CASE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. With pleasure.

Mr. CASE. I am interested in the gentleman's remarks in regard to not getting any advantage after the war is over. I think of it in connection with the statement of the Secretary of the Navy, that we should have some bases in the Pacific at the close of the war.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I did not see the statement made by the Secretary of the Navy. What was it?

Mr. CASE. My understanding is that the Secretary of the Navy stated that at the conclusion of this war we ought to secure our position in the Pacific, by some outlying naval bases.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. My position is the position of the average man on the street. I do not attach any particular significance to it beyond a personal opinion that I have gained from listening with the rest of the members of the Committee on Appropriations to the evidence that we have had before us. It is that we must take some means to prevent the rearmament of Japan. I think all of us agree on that. If we do not, we will have to fight the war again in 20 years. It is merely a matter of how we shall prevent rearmament. I am willing now to listen to any suggestion the gentleman makes along that line, and I am satisfied that we have a common purpose, a common motive, a common opinion to the extent that Japan and Germany must be prevented from rearming.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. In respect to the suggestion that during the 18 months previous to Pearl Harbor we did not do anything to lay an embargo on the shipment of goods to Japan. During that time when we refused to lay an embargo on the shipment of goods to Japan we accumulated the largest amount of rubber ever accumulated by anybody, and had we not possessed that enormous rubber reserve, then our military would have been out long before now. Because of our failure to declare that embargo, it enabled us to build up a huge reserve of rubber.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Which fully justified our position in refusing to invite the embargo.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. DONDERO. In order to take our proper place in a post-war world, does the gentleman think it is necessary that we should surrender our national sovereignty, our form of Government, or our way of life under it?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Under no circumstances. That is what we are fighting to maintain, and that is what we propose to defend at all cost.

Mr. GRANGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. GRANGER. I am sure that the gentleman is expressing the desire of a great mass of the American people in the stand that he is taking and the statement that he has already made. After the last war we came out asking nothing, and is it not a fact now that all of the nations of the world except the belligerents are looking to the United States to take the leadership and lay the foundation for a peaceful future?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. In every part of Europe today, men in chains, in concentration camps, in empty houses, watching their children starve, are stretching out their hands to America, their only remaining hope, the hope of the world.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. The gentleman speaks of a plan and a program for disarmament after the war, that is, disarmament of the belligerents. Does not the gentleman think that any feasible, practical plan will envision a League of Nations, a disarmament of the countries, and a policing power that will enforce peace throughout the world?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. All of these plans and suggestions will be welcomed and will be considered.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman has correctly stated, and I thoroughly agree with him, that Japan attacked us. But I would like to ask the gentleman, Which does he think is our greatest enemy, Japan or Germany?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Unquestionably, our most dangerous enemy is Japan.

Mr. FISH. Can the gentleman answer me, Why are we not concentrating more of our efforts against the Japanese at this time?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. We have the best qualified Army and Navy leadership in the world, and I am willing to leave it to them.

Mr. CALVIN D. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. CALVIN D. JOHNSON. I understood the gentleman to say a moment ago that Japan has been preparing for a war for 25 years. Does the gentleman think that our State Department knew those plans were being made or that that was the intention of Japan?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Oh, no. We had no positive knowledge. There was evidence which put us on guard. That is why we repeatedly tried to enter into an agreement with Japan to disarm.

Three different times we said to Japan, in 1922, 1930, and 1931, and to the other nations of the world, "Now, let us quit this absurd thing of competitive armament. Why should we spend millions of dollars and burden our people and the people of every country of the world in this race to build the most battleships and the biggest guns? Let us agree together that we will have no more wars and live in peace and amity." We made every effort to maintain peace with Japan—even up until the last minute. Their representatives were in the State Department ostensibly trying to reach an agreement between Japan and America at the time they struck.

Mr. CALVIN D. JOHNSON. The white book issued by the State Department would indicate that they had a pretty thorough knowledge as to what was existing.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. They had no positive information. Gradually through the years there grew up a volume of evidence which pointed to the fact that we had better keep our eye on Japan; but we did not propose to declare war. Our purpose was to maintain peace.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri has consumed 1 hour.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 20 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, one of the most interesting items submitted to us was a Budget estimate for $200,000 to continue the National Resources Planning Board for the rest of this fiscal year. In view of the fact that the independent offices subcommittee had already rejected the continuation of the organization beyond July 1, it was generally felt in the committee that it would be better to stop it now.

The National Resources Planning Board throughout its entire life has been made up of people without a practical viewpoint on life. It has been made up of those whose theory of life is that it is absolutely impossible for the economic system of America to take care of our people after this war is over, and that we must have some kind of fake employment or employment on public works, that we cannot afford, in order to provide the daily bread of our people.

America became great because of hard work and because of an economic system based upon the private employment of her people, based upon thrift, based upon industry, based upon the idea that we should keep our country at peace whenever it was possible and raise the standard of living of the American people.

In 150 years America has become the greatest and richest nation in the world. Her standard of living for her people is higher than anywhere else in the world. We have not educated our people to believe that they must be at somebody else's throat all the time with a saber or a gun. On the other hand, the American people are not yellow. They will fight when it is necessary to do so and there is no other recourse, for their liberty, for their country, and for the right to live. We are engaged in that kind of a struggle now.

The implication of the continuance of the National Resources Planning Board is that America is dead. It represents an attitude of defeatism. It represents an attitude that there is no future for America.

If the planners in this outfit were any good they would be working at the war effort. They would not be getting up plans based on a defeatist theory for the after-the-war period.

It is about time that the Congress began to take cognizance of the situation and began to plan for an after-the-war period in which there will be a free America. A free America with a free economic system where a man can, as he has been able to do throughout the history of America, work up to a position of real importance and real power in our country as a result of his own ability. The only way that the standards of living of America can be maintained and increased is by the increase in the capacity of our country to produce consumable goods. That has been our history. As a result of that type of free economy we have progressed. The reactionary theories of the Roosevelt administration that America is defeated make no appeal to me and I cannot support the continuation of any organization such as this one which is based entirely on a defeatist attitude toward the future of America.

Now, there has been some discussion here about the preparation for war, and I want to say a few words about that.

In 1922 the disarmament treaty was agreed to, which leveled off the navies of the world. That treaty and its extensions were lived up to, and as a result of that treaty America had just as good a Navy as any of the rest at the end of that period.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. The gentleman remembers, does he not, that one signatory power present at that conference in Washington and who signed the treaty that finally came from the conference failed to observe the stipulations of the treaty? I refer to Japan.

Mr. TABER. Well, she did later on, perhaps, but not in the early part of the picture—not in the period down to the time that she renounced and refused to go along.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. TABER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. The gentleman is mistaken about that, because Japan never repudiated that treaty, notwithstanding the fact that she was continuously violating the provisions of it.

Mr. TABER. Japan refused to go along with it in about 1931. From that date on she began to build up a Navy that was away beyond the treaty Navy. Very soon after that Hitler came on the scene. When Hitler began to come into power all these treaties were scrapped and our race was not as rapid as the race of Japan, but what did we do while that was going on? In spite of the fact that the white book that the administration has put out from the State Department indicates that for many years the Secretary of State believed that Japan was ready to spring at us whenever she got a chance, what happened? In 1937 from this country 2,081,037 tons of steel and scrap iron went to Japan—enough to build 20 battleships, 200 submarines, 10 aircraft carriers, 26 cruisers.

In 1938 1,365,721 tons went to Japan. Again, in 1939, 2,035,000 tons of scrap, and 144,000 tons of steel ingots and blooms. In 1940 after the war had started with China, which started in 1940, 936,000 tons of scrap and 285,000 tons of steel ingots and blooms went to Japan.

In addition to that scrap and steel, in 1937, $2,483,000 worth of aircraft went to Japan; in 1938, $11,062,000 worth of aircraft; in 1939, $3,306,000 worth of aircraft; in 1940, $932,000 worth of aircraft. During that period $219,000,000 worth of petroleum products went to Japan, and this included, in 1939, 555,000 barrels of aviation gas and, in 1940, 776,000 barrels of aviation gas. Oh, I do wish this administration had been alert and upon its toes to protect the interests of America.

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. BUFFETT. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman know of any greater record of appeasement in the history of that word about which so much has been said in the last few days, applied to a certain noble American, accused of being a potential appeaser? I say that this record is probably the world's greatest in appeasing.

Mr. TABER. It certainly is a record of failure in appeasement.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. COLE of Missouri. Is the gentleman implying by his statement that that is the price we paid for tin and rubber?

Mr. TABER. The tin and rubber would not have been nearly so useful to us as these things Japan got from us were to her. That oil was the thing with which she was able to start the war and to maintain her war in China. The same is likewise true of steel and aircraft.

Mr. SHAFER. How about the gold we purchased?

Mr. TABER. I presume that has something to do with it.

Mr. SHAFER. It paid the expenses, did it not?

Mr. TABER. It did.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. I think if the gentleman had traveled on the Pacific during the last 15 years he would have observed, as I and others did observe, that the Pacific was simply always filled with Japanese tankers traveling from our west coast to Japan. It was during those years, may I say to my friend from New York, that Japan prepared for the things that have happened since December 7, 1941.

Mr. TABER. That was the way she put herself in shape to make the trouble for us which she has made. I want now to come directly to the bill. There are a few items in the bill to which I wish to call attention. I have spoken about only one so far.

One item that does not appear in the bill is the item to look after farm labor. There are no printed hearings on that part of the estimate that was sent to us. Our committee decided after 2 days' hearings and a lot of work on the part of all us—and the decision was unanimous—that we would not be able to bring the parts of this bill that absolutely need to have attention in here to the House in time to meet the demands if we attempted to reach an agreement upon a program to handle agricultural labor. We felt that we must have a very considerable number of days to look the thing over, to hear the different people and the different programs, and try to work one out.

There has been no attempt on the part of the committee to dodge the program; it is just that we did not have put up to us what we believed was a satisfactory program, and we did not have the time before this bill had to be brought up to take care of that situation. We are going to have to ask the indulgence of the House to permit us to go into the whole picture, make a thorough study of it next week, and then come back here with another bill that relates to this particular program. The rest of the cuts that have been made I believe were made without any sacrifice of any real interest of any organization having to do with the war effort or the economic system of America.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Would the gentleman explain what was done with the Office for Emergency Management, and just what is the function of this agency?

Mr. TABER. The functions of that agency are rather involved. Estimates for several items were submitted to us. Let me take, first, the Office of Defense Health and Welfare Service. An item was presented involving a total program of $2,800,000 for the care of children of employed mothers, and payments to States amounting to a total of about $3,000,000,000. It was a part of a program which it was suggested to us would cost $30,000,000 a year.

There seemed to be no intelligent method of setting it up; there seemed to be no intelligent method of handling it, and we did not feel that we were in any position to bring that in here. It may be that something will have to be done along this line, but the program presented to us was so crude and incompetent, in our opinion, that we did not feel that we could consider it.

There are several small items in the bill dealing with travel expenses and items with reference to the Office of Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs, and to the Office of Defense Transportation.

A program was suggested for the National War Labor Board. The regular portion of the program amounting to $3,250,000 we allowed. A lot of items with reference to the Bureau of Labor Statistics we did not allow because we did not feel that they made a good case for them.

With reference to the Manpower Commission, we refused to appropriate $2,454,000 which had previously been denied by the Labor and Social Security Subcommittee, denied by the full committee, and denied by this House last year. They claimed they could not keep the people, but this was the history of the thing: They have a set-up calling for 21,900. They claim they had a turnover of 14,000 in a year, a large portion of whom were boys who were taken into the service.

At the end of the period they had over 19,000 on their roll, indicating that they were not very seriously embarrassed by the salaries they had to pay or that they would have any more than 2,000 vacancies out of the 21,000 employees. That is what was in here under Office for Emergency Management very largely.
